A Scribe's Portrait--Look in the Glass.

Grace Greenwood tells us that Fanny Fern is exceedingly regular in her literary habits. She bargained with Robert Bonner to furnish a weekly contribution for the New York Ledger, and wonderful to tell, for fourteen years her articles were always up to the stipulated time. Our informant has the heroism to aver that with herself it was far otherwise. She would have squandered the last moment of grace and had no extenuation to plead on to that. We are left alone to the conclusion that these two energetics, that never "crossed orbits," are quite contrary in their gyrations. One a dutiful planet, the other a defiant comet.

I take great pleasure in affirming—perhaps to the torment of some fidgety body who reads this—that all the instincts of my nature prompt me to sympathize with the afflicted Grace. The other may be a commercial superior, may receive higher bids in the market place, but what do I care for that. I love people, especially, if they are women; who are only complicated clocks with locomotive and manual attachments, not to speak of a few other inexplicables, minor or major as you choose to reflect. These intellectual chronometers are perpetually admiring that even old Time flies either too fast or too slow. They see methodical specimens, as to me he is always, like a standing chronicle of wearisome spirit of aggressive order. Perhaps the personification in your mind of a perfect governess; whose everybody requires you to exercise the world love upon. In spite of the sameness of the associations, you remember his irritability over your inability to ever replace the long-legged, crooked-nosed antiquated tongs, according to the established rule made and provided and by himself, at least, always observed. I perfer—and I dare to flaunt it in the face of the big world, to give an occasional chase to the colossal butterflies that chance to flit across my rustic pathway—winged flowers, bearing whole rainbows of beauty and promise upon their backs, even at the risk of crossing the threshold of the school room, some indefinite number of seconds after "school is took up" and receiving an eloquent lecture, if not some more substantial token, to convince me of the superstitive evils of truancy. Though a veritable "Cotton's us of roads," I never hope to outgrow the authority of the Ichabod Cranes, a dynasty never extinct. Mind you, it is not tragedy that I prefer when my own precious veins are pumped to furnish the ingredients; but, it is better to die glory stained than always to live in thrall; but, better yet it is to manage to achieve such success on these tangential departures, as to escape both the thunder and the blood. Still there is no success unattended by risks. I remember the story of Cesar crossing the Rubecon. I remember, too, Cesar's fortunes. He did not tread in the foot-worn foot-prints of his dead ancestors. The world has heard the trumpet of his fame. A cause may be something more than a uniform antecedent; but, that about accords with the world's logic.

I never could be transmuted into a successful journalist. If I were required to write up in the most graphic style of the art, the freest sensational item gleaned from the telegraphs at a given hour of the day—or night, so as to fill up just so many inches in newspaper column, regardless of Sanitary and domestic atmospheres or the value of my credit. Every such essay would be a game of chance with small hope of winning. A good deal might depend upon the quality of a batch of bread. A clumsy or careless kitchen maid is, no doubt, responsible for many a dull page. I am a picture loved rather than worshipped, a [illegible] representative, [illegible] sentiment of "depression, [illegible] of all I ever met." Every new [illegible] an immortal architect, building [illegible] ter for eternity.

The manufacture of copy for the printer, as a task, is indescribably irksome, is as tedious as the toils of the fabled Sisyphus, and about as fruitless as the attempt to chain the Hell-spent. When once the soul is thoroughly eclipsed, no ordinary fascination of will can remove the incubus, and call around the pen the laughing sunbeams, required to nature the clusters of Eschol. But when the fine phrensy does come, a commodity by no means always "born after the will of flesh" then the chains fall off and are supplanted by a grateful gospel of liberty, and the materialization of thought, is something more than the ingenious collocation of words from a dictionary. I am inclined to think that these potential moods, even in the case of the most successful writers are like the mountains which exist at the expense of corresponding depressions. The law of action and reaction holds true of mind as of matter. A prodigious performance is as surely followed by exhaustion in literary, as in other pursuits. Hence it is, that the most impassioned authors move in very eccentric orbits. The Fanny Ferns may always command a certain share of respect, but the highest crystals of literature must come from pens of a different order. The real crown diamonds are not flung out every week to fulfil a contract trade with the owner of Dexter.

THE STARKE BROTHERS.—Our readers have been apprised of the [illegible] of the Milwaukee Tug Boat Line to send one of their boats, the Starke Brothers, and a [illegible] to the Pine [illegible] On Tuesday [illegible] above the bar. The [illegible] was raised [illegible] feet, and with powerful purchases, and the assistance of her own power was brought inside. The prosecution of the undertaking has exhibited on the part of Messrs Starke and employes an admirable degree of perseverance and good [illegible]. The tug Starke Bros. registers 36 tons burthen. She is 61 feet long by 15 feet wide, and draws 8 feet of water. Her cylinder is 18x20, and her boiler and machinery are all in prime condition. She is commanded by Capt. Theodore Beck, and her engineer is Nicholas Smith. Mr. Conrad Starke, one of the senior members of the firm is at present with the tug, but he will return home, leaving Mr. Fred Starke, his nephew, as manager of their business here. All are pleasant and agreable gentlemen, and thoroughly understand their business. The tug will make a channel at least ten feet deep, and keep it through the season, making our lakes accessable to the larger class of vessels. The enterprise is one of incalculable benefit to this region, and a gigantic stride toward the future commercial importance of which we have hopefully dreamed so long. Success attend the Starke Brothers.

Another one of those eight day clocks drawn at Carpenter & Bartholomew with a package of prize coffee.

THE Schooner W. A. Smith will trade this season between Charlevoix and Manistee, carring lumber this way and limestone the other.

Piles of new goods expected at Carpenter & Bartholomew's

EGGS, EGGS, EGGS.—Pure bred Buff Cochin eggs for sale from prize fowls N. Y. State Fair. Also White Leghorn and Black Hamburg's, warranted pure. (Fullerton's strain Ontario) $2 00 per setting, (13 eggs). A. R. UPRIGHT
Charlevoix, Mich.

We regard the success of the Starke Brothers enterprise as equal in importance to a $10,000 appropriation, and in fact better than those we have been receiving for the past two years.

[illegible] at Carpenter & Bartholomew's.

[illegible] invites the jewelry [illegible] store of Dr. Lewis. [illegible] permanently cast his lot among us, and we hope our people will patronize him. You need not be afraid to leave a good watch in his hands for repairs.

THE tug Starke Brothers is four years old, and cost $12,000.

THE young schooner Flora is in the river ready to clear for Beaver Harbor with a load of hoops.

DR. LEVI LEWIS has been appointed Health Officer of the Township of Charlevoix, under the new law.

IN next issue of this paper Geo. W. Crouter will commence giving the public a series of useful family receipts. Look for them.

FIRST BOAT. The Northern Transit Boat Oswegatchie stopped at this port yesterday p. m., bound up.

THE UPPER RIVER.—As soon as the tug Starke Brothers has dredged the lower channel she will turn her attention to the upper river.

J. E. GRIELICK & CO.—We call attention to the new advertisement of J. E. Grielick & Co., of Traverse City. They are an old and reliable firm, and can do just what they say. Their reputation is unsurpassed RESIGNED.—L. D. Bartholomew, Supervisor of Charlevoix Township resigned that office on account of ill health. The town Board has filled the vacancy by appointing D. C. Nettleton.

BRIDGE.—Application has been made, in legal form, to the Commissioner of Highways of the Township of Charlevoix, to repair the bridge in this village, which will undoubtedly be promptly done. The contract for raising said bridge has not yet been let.

THE HARBOR APPROPRIATION.—The Secretary of War has determined upon his line of action in relation to harbor improvements, which, it is evident, for this year at least, will be a continuation of the policy which last year deprived Charlevoix of what Congress voted for her harbor improvement. Among the appropriations of a year ago to be made available this season, that of Charlevoix has been excluded. Those who know say that the hardest death of all is death from imaginary causes. It may yet be discovered that imaginary blessings are as good as real ones, and that by some mythological charm phantasies of the mind may be transformed to honorable realities. But, unfortunately for Charlevoix we don't live in that age. It may be that our Washington friends consider an imaginary blessing sufficient to render us happy, and that the longer it lasts—like the boy and his pie—the more thoroughly it will be enjoyed, and the less apt it will be to create dyspeptic abdominal irregularities. Since long before election our appetite has been whetted by a savory bait, but the public pie has been held at a safe distance from our hungry mouths. "Brevet" harbor appropriations don't open harbors, and the people are tired of this jack in the box business. If the will of the people, expressed through their representatives, is to be counted by the Executive as naught, let us have an autocracy and done with it. We shall waste no more ammunition on decoy ducks.

CHARLEVOIX, - - MICHIGAN.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

FOREIGN.

THE news from Constantinople and St. Petersburg, of the 14th and 16th, indicated the immediate declaration of hostilities. It was stated that Austria had resolved upon the armed occupation of Bosnia; that the Greek Government had ordered the raising of an army of 60,000 men for active and immediate service; that an international outbreak was imminent in Roumar Poland and contiguous Russian Provinces, that the Russian fleets in the Atlantic and Pacific had been ordered to rendezvous in the Mediterranean, and that Turkey had begun the erection of a bridge across the Danube at Kalafat.

A VIENNA dispatch of the 16th says Austria would not long remain an indifferent spectator to the action of Turkey and Russia, and that her position would be that of defensive neutrality.

BERLIN specials of the 17th say that 200,000 Germans in Russia were about emigrating to Brazil and the United States to avoid draft into the army.

THE Montenegrin delegates left Constantinople for home on the 17th, the negotiations with Turkey having failed.

ACCORDING to a Vienna telegram of the 17th, 40 men were soaking in Austria and England to produce the resumption of negotiations between Turkey and Russia, using the eighth article of the Treaty of Paris as a starting point.

A ST. PETERSBURG telegram of the 18th says Russia had already issued her declaration of war, and Turkish ironclads had arrived at the mouth of the Danube.

LOCKHART & DEMPSTER and Glenn, Walker & Co., commission merchants and shippers at Liverpool, England, have failed for large sums.

A BUCHAREST telegram of the 18th says the Roumanian Government had decided to concentrate 100,000 men for the protection of the capital against the expected attack of Turkish irregular troops. It was reported from Constantinople that the Porte would proclaim a state of siege throughout Turkey.

ACCORDING to latest dispatches of the 19th, negotiations were going on, with a view to a separate peace between Turkey and Russia. The Russian Government has practically abandoned the extension of the Black Sea zone. Ten fast boat-having Odessa on the 19th. It was reported from Bucharest that troops were gathering in Little Wallachia, to dispute the passage of the Danube by the Turkish forces.

AN explosion in a coal-mine at Ponty-pridd, Wales, on the 19th, imprisoned nine men behind a column of coal 120 feet thick. Continuous efforts for three days resulted in opening communication with them on the 19th. Five were alive, but four had wandered to other parts of the mine and were believed to have perished.

ADVICES to Belgrade telegrams of the 19th, fighting had again occurred.

PARA specials of the 19th say the Russian Embassy had been closed, and that Russian interests would be cared for at the German Embassy.

DOMESTIC.

IT was reported at Deadwood, D. T., on the 18th, that 100 of Crazy Horse's band of Indians had taken to the field again. The cause of this renegade movement was supposed to be the decision announced by Special Tail, in representing that only the arms taken by them in the Custer fight would be demanded of them specially; another at Red Cloud, when in reality the Government demanded of them all arms and ponies.

A SAVANNAH (Ga.) dispatch of the 14th states that the deathly lee, from that port for Jersey, was destroyed by fire at three a. m., on the 13th, in a heavy southeast gale, eighty miles south of Tybee, thirty miles off shore. Thirteen of the crew were saved on a life-raft. The others (eighteen in number) and three passengers were missing.

ABOUT 1,000 Northern families made a formal surrender of their arms, points, etc., to Gen. Crook at the Spotted-Tail Agency in Nebraska, on the 14th. Their entry is said to have been very dramatic. Encircling Spotted Tail's camp and discharging their arms in the air, they rallied forth the whole force of that Chief to greet them, after which their Head Chief delivered a short speech to the people, intimating his desire for peace by laying his rifle at the General's feet.

THE Chicago Journal of the 15th states that Mayor Heath had received a letter from Minneapolis, asking for information as to a lottery scheme, the drawing of which is advertised to come off at "Crosby's Opera House, Chicago, June 12, 1877," under the direction of the Leavenworth City and Topeka lotteries. The Directors' names are appended to the circular, but the Journal says no such person could be found in the city, and that paper pronounces the whole thing to be a swindle.

IT was reported at Camp Robinson, Neb., on the 16th, that Crazy Horse, with about 2,000 of his people, was moving toward that Agency with the intention of surrendering. This will leave the country clear of hostile Indians, with the exception of Sitting Bull's force and some few stragglers from the other bands that have come into the Agencies.

THE fiscal year shipped to Europe from the country during the nine months ending March last amounted to $1,278,810 pounds, valued at $9,958,482. The statement shows a gradual increase from $6,000 pounds in October, 1876, to 6,707,885 in March the present year.

PERSONAL.

AT a meeting in New York, on the 16th, of the Directors of the Chicago, Rock Island & Pacific Railroad Company, Hugh Riddle was elected President, and Daven H. Rowe, Vice-President. Mr. Riddle has been for a long time Vice-President and Superintendent of the road.

MAJ. RENO, recently tried by court-martial on the charge of insulting the wife of a brother officer, who sentenced to be dismissed from the service. He forwarded to the War Department a request for delay in the presentation of the case to the President, claiming that he has additional evidence that will lead to a mitigation of his sentence, and the request has been granted.

A DECISION in favor of Myra Clark Gaines, involving millions of dollars' worth of property in New Orleans, has been rendered by District Judge Billings, of that city. The litigation has extended over forty years, and it is said this decision ends the struggle in favor of the plucky claimant.

IT was reported from New York, on the 17th, that Wm. M. Tweed had sent to Atty-Gen. Fairchild a proposition that, in return for liberty and rest, he would pull up all his property, be a faithful citizen on behalf of the people, and make a full disclosure of his criminal connections. The World gives what purports to be a synopsis of this proposition, which is in the nature of a confession, and which implicates several prominent citizens of the city and State, including members of the Legislature. Many of those alleged to be implicated have since emphatically denied being guilty of any fraudulent transactions.

THE President has appointed John A. Kasson, of Iowa, to succeed Caleb Cushing as Minister to Spain.

A BANQUET was given at the Executive Mansion, in Washington, on the evening of the 19th, in honor of the Grand Duke Alexis and Constantine. The guests present included the Russian Legation, Diplomatic Corps, Members of the President's Cabinet, Admiral Porter an the Justices of the Supreme Court.

POLITICAL.

GOV. HAMPTON, on the 14th, addressed a note to the Chamberlain officials requesting them to turn over their offices to their successors, subject to a decision of the Supreme Court. The ex-officials refused to do, asserting that they held their offices by declaration of the State Canvassers from the face of all the election returns, that their contestants had taken the case to the Supreme Court, and that Hampton had no right to anticipate the judgment of that court or in any way to pass upon their title, and that his action was a violation of his pledges to leave disputed questions to legal settlement.

AT the recent election in New Hampshire all the Constitutional amendments submitted to the votes were carried save the first, to strike out the word "Protestant" from the Bill of Rights, and the twelfth, prohibiting removal from office for political causes. The seventh, abolishing the religious test as a qualification for office, was adopted by thirteen votes over the two-thirds required.

THE California State Supreme Court, on the 19th, issued a peremptory writ of mandate to the Secretary of State to issue to Dudley as the Republican candidate for Congress in the Fourth District, his certificate.

A JOINT CAUCUS of the Packard Louisiana Legislature on the 18th, adopted resolutions rejecting the propositions accepted by the Nicholls House for a reorganization of the Legislature. The resolutions were handed to the Committee and forwarded by them to the President.

A WASHINGTON dispatch of the 19th says ex-Gov. Kellogg, of Louisiana, had that day received the following telegram from New Orleans: "Please inquire of President Hayes if he is by his direction that the Commissioners recommend the members of Packard's Legislature to join Nicholls. Two of our trusted men left to-day; such seem to persuasion." Kellogg replied: "If it is true that the Commissioners are so doing, I am satisfied that they are acting on their own instructions, and without instructions from the President."

THE New York Assembly has recently passed a bill amending the statute relating to the election of President and Vice-President. It provides for electing Electors-at-Large on the State ticket, and the other Electors on the tickets in the several Congressional Districts.

THE Republican State Central Committee of Ohio have decided to hold the next State Convention at Cleveland, Aug. 1.

THE Louisiana Commission, in their report to the President on the 15th, enclosed a letter from Gov. Nicholls, in which he declares that the State Government of which he is the head will secure a vigorous and efficient enforcement of the laws, so that all persons and property will be fully protected; the establishment of a system of public education, so that all, regardless of race or color, may receive equal advantages thereunder, and the fostering of immigrant on, in order to hasten the development of the great natural resources of the State.

A TELEGRAM from New Orleans, on the morning of the 20th, says the Packard Legislature was rapidly dissolving many of their historic-ing-board members joining the Nicholls body, thus giving the latter a quorum. A series of members of the former Legislature was held, at which resolutions were adopted declaring an unalterable faith in the legality and justice of the claims of Packard to the Governorship, and denouncing the Commission—if they have acted upon their own individual responsibility—for their silence unwarranted interference with the domestic affairs of a State to which they do not belong, and a flagrant violation of the principles of local self-government, advocated by the President if, on the other hand, their action in the manner set forth has been directed by the Chief Executive of the Nation, we leave it to be characterized in fitting terms by the American people." The interference complained of consisted in members of the Committee recommending members of the Packard Legislature to accept the terms offered by the Nicholls Legislature as the best and only terms that could be secure, this causing the disintegration of the former body. Gov. Packard, it is stated, addressed the caucus, expressing a determination to continue the contest to the end.

A SCHOOLMASTER asked a class what Shylock meant when he said, "My deeds upon my head." "Well," said one of the boys, "I don't know unless he carried his papers in his hat."

A VERMONT woman left her umbrella at Sacramento, and had it expressed home at a cost of nine dollars. Nothing like having your own umbrella.

Marrying in France.

That young girls and young men in France are sedulously kept apart, that wooing and winning are unnecessary preliminaries to a French marriage, are facts that have been much commented upon; but how they marry in France, and the etiquette of that very formal and business-like ceremonial, and the preliminaries considered necessary thereto, are, we believe, but little understood on our side of the water.

The first thing to be done is to go through that time-honored formality called popping the question. But a French aspirant for matrimonial honors is not allowed to make his proposals in person to the young lady. That would be a sad breach of les convenances, and would probably horrify the jeune personne out of her seven senses. A friend is charged with the delicate office of asking her parents, and if they will accept M. So-and-so for a son-in-law, but if it would be agreeable to them to consider him in that possible light. Should the answer prove favorable, the gentleman may desire an interview with the lady's parents or guardians, at which interview the young lady must not be present. In this first interview all business questions, including the importance of the dowry, and the most original important one of the young man's fortune, expectations, etc., are settled. Should all these preliminaries be favorably arranged, a second interview is decided upon, and the day and hour rigorously settled beforehand. Exactly at the specified time the future bridegroom must present himself, carefully but not too carefully dressed—that point is essential. The betrothed, in elegant but simple attire, awaits his coming, surrounded by her parents and relatives. After the first visit he is entitled to be received as a prétendu, but must request admission to this privilege either by writing or through one of his near relatives. If he could once be coaxed, he is then for the first time presented to his lady-love as her future husband, and receives a kiss on the forehead in token of betrothal. The gentleman must immediately send to his fiancée a bouquet on the days that he intends to call. The engaged pair must never be permitted to indulge in a tête-à-tête, nor may they call each other by their first names without using the prefixes of monsieur and mademoiselle. An engagement is to be kept secret, and should be publicly announced only a few days before the signing of the contract. Of course, French engagements are usually very brief, such a life of constraint and formality being agreeable to neither party.

These preliminary formalities having been scrupulously gone through, the engagement is openly announced with, next comes the question of the wedding, or rather weddings, for our French couple must be married twice over, once in the mairie, in order to accordance with the law, and once at church, to satisfy religious scruples. This latter ceremony, by the way, is essential to the legality of the marriage; but not to be married in church is considered a proof of irreligion and political baseness of the most virulent type. Now comes an amount of bother which, to our extremely simple ideas as regards marriage, appears to be of most stupid and unnecessary. As a necessary preliminary to the civil marriage, the bride and groom must arm themselves with half a dozen documents each. First comes the acte de naissance, or birth-certificate then the consent in writing of both parents, or, if either or both of them be dead, the proofs of their decease, and the consent of grandparents or guardians in their stead. If you are sixty years of age, and have parents still living, this written consent is still indispensable, unless, indeed, you go through the formality of the trois sommations respectueuses, which consists in "respectfully summoning" your recalcitrant parents three times at short intervals. No one should not espouse the beloved of your heart, after which you can do as you please. But such a proceeding is looked upon with so much disfavor by French society that it is only resorted to in very extreme cases. If you are an officer in the army, you must get the permission of the Minister of War to your nuptials, and he will not grant it unless the bride possesses either a dowry of thirty thousand francs or a settled income of twelve hundred francs a year. All these consents obtained, next comes the publication of banns, which takes place not only in the church, but also at the mayoralty. The signing of the contract is the next formality to be fulfilled. Usually, in Paris, the ceremonial is made the occasion of a family festival, and a splendid dress is prepared for the bride, very often a faux-semble of the wedding-dress, only in some delicate evening-dread, but instead of white. The notary reads aloud the contract, after which the bridegroom rises, bows to the bride, and signs his name, afterward passing the pen to her. She signs in her turn, and must then hand the pen to the mother of the groom who must give it in turn to the mother of the bride. These little points of etiquette are strictly observed. All the other relations then sign in turn, according to age or station. It is considered a great honor to obtain some high personage as a witness to the contract. If there is a fete given on the occasion, the corbeille or wedding-presents of the bridegroom, and the trousseau as well, are exhibited to the guests. The corbeille comprises shawls, jewels, gloves, laces, furs, etc., coquin, with a piece constituting a sum of money in gold, the whole inclosed in a large and elegant box, or in a handsome work-table. The value of this present is usually supposed to represent one per cent. of the young lady's dowry.—Appletons' Journal for May.

Near-Sightedness.

One of the questions now enlisting attention is that of a medical supervisor for our schools. We have no doubt that the supervision proposed is a public necessity; that diphtheria, scarlet fever, measles and other contagious diseases among children, might thereby be materially limited in their ravages; and the injury now done to the permanent health by foul air, improper temperature, badly-arranged light, and by undue stimulation of young brains, might be greatly diminished; and that many practical ideas, of life-long value, on physiology and hygiene, might be rendered familiar to pupils, either directly through such supervisor, or indirectly through their teachers.

Few, however, would think that near-sightedness was a grave subject enough for a medical inspector. Most look on it as very harmless, and as pretty likely to insure good sight when that of others would be failing. In rare cases, where the near-sightedness remains unchanged, this may result; but statistics show that the general tendency is to increase, and this increase caused by a progressive elongation of the ball of the eye, may soon give rise to distressing symptoms, and at length terminate in vision greatly impaired or utterly ruined.

The fact is, a near-sighted eye is a diseased eye. The highest authorities are now fully agreed in this. And the change usually takes place in the early school-years, and increases rapidly through the period of education and growth.

But what makes the matter a very grave one, is that our school systems in this country and in Europe are rearing the disease well-nigh universal.

Dr. Cohn, of Breslau, examined over 10,000 school children and pupils, and published the result with a case of blindness that among those who had just entered school, cases began to appear and multiplied as the years went by, until, by the tenth year of school life, they constituted about one-quarter of all (24.1); of the twelfth, about one-half (45.5); and at the fourteenth, more than three-fifths (63.6). Other distinguished investigators have reached similar results in other parts of Europe.

In our own country it is essentially the same. The majority of the pupils in our city schools are found to be thus affected. Examinations in our colleges show that those who are affected as entrance become more near-sighted as they advance in their course. The fact that may seem singular is that a large portion—it was so with nearly one-quarter of the near-sighted in a class examined in Harvard University—was not aware that their sight is defective.

Whether a medical inspector is appointed for our schools or not, we trust that measures may be taken for the arrest of the alarming deterioration of sight now going on among the youth of our land. Meanwhile, the following rules may serve as helps:

1. Keep the printed page nearly two feet from the eye.

2. As far as possible secure good air, not overheated—not above seventy.

3. Never read with the direct rays of the sun falling on the page.

4. Don't read with insufficient light.

5. Don't read immediately after a hearty meal.

6. Avoid books with extra fine print.

7. Don't continue any reading or study more than two hours without change and regulus.—Youth's Companion.

Watch the Children's Feet.

THE following advice from the New York Evening Post is very important. Let every mother remember it:

"Lifelong discomfort and sudden death often come to children through the inattention or carelessness of the parents. A child should never be allowed to go to sleep with cold feet; the thing to be last attended to is to see that the feet are dry and warm. Neglect of this has often resulted in dangerous attacks of croup, diphtheria, or a fatal sore throat. Always, on coming from school, on entering the house from a visit or errand or rainy, muddy or thawy weather, the child should remove its shoes, and the mother should herself ascertain whether the stockings are the least damp. If they are, they should be taken off, the feet held before the fire and rubbed with the hands till perfectly dry, and another pair of shoes put on. The reserve shoes and stockings should be kept where they are perfectly dry, so as to be ready for use at a moment's notice."

GERMANY is shipping potatoes to this country (Philadelphia) as an experiment. It might pay well at the present high prices and low rates of freight.

WITHIN a radius of ten miles of Lexington, Fla., there are now 150,000 bearing orange trees.

Continuity.

To do one thing extra well is about all that can be asked of a man in this world. In fact, it is an open question whether to do just one thing, and do that well, is not the highest duty of man toward the world and its future. If so many attempts were not made by individuals to do many things at once, and no one thing at any time, there would not be quite so much a failure. And if there never had been men to grapple with the one idea and conquer it, letting the many other ideas go to the dogs—or, more properly, to other men—man would not be near as much a success as he is.

An old Chinese song says:

"If a man will talk,
Talk all the time,
If a man will talk,
Talk all the time.
If a man will talk,
He'll brace his back in a rock."

And it is about this way with everything. To grasp one subject to enter one field, to engage in one profession; to wrestle with one art; to follow one line of business; to stick to one trade—faith plucs, perseverance, unyielding will and study—always means success, if not fame, for the devotee. In these various fields of labor lead to the most popular division.

It is the lawyer who follows one line in his profession who best succeeds. He may aim to be a great criminal lawyer; a great probate lawyer; a great tax-title lawyer, or a great Constitutional lawyer; and, if he ever does grow really great, it must be with a title to excellence in exalting one of these particular lines of his calling, and no more than one.

A man may aim at eminence in literature, and if his ambitions dreams be realized, it must be—though it promise as a poet, editor, novelist, lawwriter, and historian? No. Not as all these in one, but as one of these quite to the exclusion of all the rest. Or he may aim for it as a writer in one line of business. He cannot be a very great merchant, combination, manufacturer, banker, railroad operator, speculator, theater-manager and cattle-drover at one and the same time. He must take some one of these as his leading aim, and make a specialty of that one. It is the only way that great trade schemes are pushed ahead and that millionaires are made.

This one-idea theory will hold good in every calling of life. It is the cranium of genius, and the source of public opinion, the wheat of money, the woof of fame, and the soul of all progress. In the lap of children we see the germs of all the renowned in all ages. In the sayings of its conquests we see all the achievements of science, literature, religion and trade, which have accumulated to bless the present time.

To the young mind—and, in fact, little better advice than that contained in the words, "Do some one thing in life, and do it well." The earth is cumbered with men who are good for little or nothing by being a little good at many things. The man who has no superior in his line never wants for work. It is the other man—the one clever at many things—a no hope for employment and gets none.

To be able to perform a special work—to excel and excel in one thing—this is the secret key which unlocks the golden vaults of Fortune, and the chilled-steel chisel which cuts deep names in the granite-column of Fame. In religion, the worthy of the period is, "Hold the Fort;" and in business the ambitious man can write above his calling no better motto than this same, only spelling it—"Hold the Four-t-be!"—Chicago Journal.

CHARLEVOIX, - - MICHIGAN.

"THE WORTHY POOR."

A dog of morals, firm and sure,
Went out to seek the "worthy poor."
"Dear Ounce," she said, "I'll feed them out,
And end their woes, without a doubt."

She wandered near, she wandered wide,
And many dogs her vision blocks—
Some well to do, some "to be fed,"
And some—all very much in need.

So poor they were—without a home,
Battered and bruised, and lame;
No friends, no help. "What lives they've led,
To come to this!" our doggie said.

"I laughed and gave to them; I'm sure
They drank of the worthy poor,
They must have fought or been disgraced,
My charity must be well placed."

Some dogs she found, quite of her mind;
So thrifty they—so sleek and kind!
"Ah me!" she said, "were they in need,
To help them would be joy indeed."

"Pass still the same day in, day out;
The poorest dogs were poor, no doubt;
But they were neither clean nor wise,
As she could see with half her eyes.

"I'm strange what faults come out to view
When folks are poor. She said, "'Tis true
They feed some! help, but, as for me,
I must not waste my charity."

So home she went, and dropped a tear,
"I've done my duty, that is clear.
I've searched and searched the village round,
And not one worthy poor I've found."

And all this while, the sick and lame
And hungry suffered all the same.
They were not pleased, were not meat—
But she had more than she could eat!

And don't you think it was a sin?
Was hers the right way to begin?
No, no! it was outright, the same,
For she was rich and they were poor.

O ye who have enough to spare!
To suffering give your ready care;
Waste not your charitable mood
Only in sifting out the good.

For, on the whole, though it is right
To keep the "worthy poor" in sight,
This world would run with sconce a hitch
If all could find the worthy rich.

"THE MAN IN THE MOON."

Is there a man in the moon? The question is not altogether a light one; nor is it, on the other hand, one of mere shadow. It has more than a surface allusion, at the outside, to that mythical personage who has immemorially borne that title, and whose existence depends, and will continue to depend, upon the persistence of superstitious faith, or upon the ingenuity of optical fancies in blending the exhalations of lunar light and shade into the general balance of a human face.

The legend of such an existence is one of great antiquity. Some very imaginative persons have shaped the outlines, traceable upon the surface of the moon by her full, into the figure of a man leaning upon a pitchfork, upon which he has been carrying a faggot of sticks picked up on Sunday, and the origin of this fabulous fancy is traced to the reward in the Book of Numbers, chapter xv., and verses 32 and 36 inclusive. Passing through the usual phases of such legends, this one was mentioned, at length, in Dante but as bearing a thorn-bush and a lantern, accompanied by a dog. It is undoubtedly this version of the old myth that appears in the prologue of "Midsummer Night's Dream," where Quince replies to Bottom's suggestion that a casement of the great window of the chamber where they were to play should be left open, that the moon might supply them with the moonlight for the meeting of Pyramus and Thisbe:

"Ay, or else one must come in with bush of thorns and a lantern, and say he comes to disfigure, or to present the person of moonshine?"

There is also an allusion to this popular notion in Chaucer's "Troilus and Cresseide," where the renowned old poet says of this lunatic:

"He stode the beste."

The tradition is not yet exhausted, but goes back, indeed, almost to the Genesis of our race, making the man in the moon to be Cain with his dog and thorn-bush, the latter supposed to represent the thorns and briers of the fall, and the dog being service as the falsehood who prompted Cain to his fratricidal crime. There is yet another, and more poetical fable of the origin of this mythical personage, which represents him as Endymion born to the moon by Diana.

These old traditions, popular and poetical alike, have served to give to the fancy of a human form and face on the moon's disk a breadth and perpetuity of force upon the uncultivated mind, and in the case of many not more palpable fantasies, they hold is narrowly separated from faith. The inquiry with which this essay begins demands for its satisfactory answer, however, more than this superficial dress in a prepared for the same time. He must take some one of these as his leading aim, and make a specialty of that one. It is the only way that great trade schemes are pushed ahead and that millionaires are made.

This one-idea theory will hold good in every calling of life. It is the cranium of genius, and the source of public opinion, the wheat of money, the woof of fame, and the soul of all progress. *The author of the famous "Moon Hoax."

some part period of its existence, poured their Vesuvian tides of lava and scoriæ all over its valleys and plains. It has been stated, with but faint show of probability, that this huge celestial cinder has been perforated, here and there, by its fires, and that the brilliant spots, or flashes of light, occasionally caught on the lenses of exploring telescopes are only glimpses of direct sunlight seen through the ghastly craters and crevices left by the ravages of incineration!

All that has been said or written about the physical condition of the earth's errant and fickle attendant round, however, be taken with allowance. It is beyond all peradventure chargeable with the fault of one-sidedness, for upon one side only of that always questionable orb has even telescopic vision rested. Upon the hemisphere of the moon which no human eye has seen or can see, save only as her librations serve, in swing her opposite edges alternately, and for a few leagues of their mysterious terrain—into the sweep of our great lenses. The moon thus may have large oceans with the same period that is connected in her revolution about our globe, and thus she lies ever plashed with our betenderers a gigantic "Lake Erie" and seek—with the "tides" always on her own part—the "seek" on their's. It is not impossible, therefore, that the latus incognitus of our satellite may be less Alp-like in its surface-aspect than the side which she turns to us. If we could inspect it we might miss the "ragged edge" which everywhere offending itself upon our pressure sight. There, the mottled face might disappear, and its external conditions seem more compatible with the ideas we have of a habitable planet.

The difficulties already considered would not, however, disappear from the problem. If the visible hemisphere has no air and no water, then neither could her unseen face glow with animated forms and forces, nor smile with the verdant hues of seasons and gold and crimson clouds.

There is also another drawback to the pleasing fancy that the invisible side of the moon is populated. Its night is a whole fortnight long, for its supposed "man" has never had a glimpse even of that great light which our earth pours upon the hemisphere she continually presents to us. Darkness must profound—Chimmerian gloom must wrap, for fortnight's scores of dreary hours at a time, that cis-side of our satellite, which our fancy may yet attempt from the volcanic fate and ghastly incineration of the side we see.

We can scarcely find, then, any other solution of the problem we are entertaining, than a negative to its question. There is "no man in the moon," none generically any more than there is, specially and superficially. The fable of the ages in this resolution is not more unreal than the fancy of the pseudo-explorer to whose ingenious vagary we have made allusion.

Whatever there may be in the moonman, is there not somewhat of regret mingled with the assurance with which we reach this end of our quest? The vigorous fields morning may have, from the lunar heights of the heavens, irradiated by the dazzling sunlight of the day and by the magnificent earth-light of the night—supposing they were so organized that they could hear the unrefracted, unreflected, undiffused and undimmed glory of the former—are lost now to human gaze, and the loss, as our imaginary measures and defines it, is vast, indeed.

It is melancholy, moreover, to reflect upon the utter lonesomeness of that orb, so fair to us, so friendly in her office, that we can scarcely help to call her "fickle!" How sad it seems that she should swing upon her lunar axes equicolidial, evolution in rhythmic melodies which no delicate ear can catch, and that as she sails majestically through the deep interspaces of the empyrean, the wondrous tale of her birth, which we have been taught to believe she tells to us nightly, is as voiceless to her gloomy depths and as echoless to her glittering heights as—unpeopled with sensitive men and women—as they are to us, when we look reverently up to her silver throne and vainly listen for the sounds that never come.

Is it any mitigation of this half-sorrow that we confess to feeling, in dismissing the idea of "a man in the moon"—as altogether mythical—that we may go back in our imagination to the days and years when her silvery face—unpeopled with sensitive men and women—as they are to us, when we look reverently up to her silver throne and vainly listen for the sounds that never come.

Hardly; we say; and as we content ourselves with the negative solution of the question at the outset of this paper—there is never "a man in the moon."—Wm. C. Richards, in Standard (Chicago.)

A Young Frenchman.

A YOUNG Frenchman to avoid conscription, pleaded that his right arm was paralyzed. The story was not believed, and various pretexts were resorted to to compel him to accompany the efficiency of the member. It was proposed to cut it off, but the young man old not shrink in the presence of the surgeon and his instruments. Under pretext of talking him to another hospital for the operation, he was thrown into the river that was crossed. He at first swam with his left arm, but finding that insufficient finally struck out with his right, and to evade his trickery.

OUR NEW YORK LETTER.

New York, April 27, 1877.

News has doubtless reached you regarding Tweed's revelations, a synopsis of which was published here early this week. This confession has been long promised, and when it came there was a general ducking of heads all over the city and state, something similar to that which took place in the old Scotch Kirk whose pastor one morning broke into his discourse with the sudden announcement that he was about to throw his prayer book at an unfaithful husband whom he saw in his audience. The full particulars are not known yet, the document remaining in the hands of the attorney-general, pending his consideration of the proposition that accompanied it, namely, that Tweed is to be set free, and to be insured against further prosecution, on condition that he produces his proofs of the allegations of his so-called confession. If this be rejected by the government the old Spartan threatens to relapse into his clam like silence. Enough has already leaked out however to furnish material for numberless suits and investigations, the latter being loudly courted by those whose names are found in the statement published. Queer thing, that Tweed is known to have stolen millions and to have distributed his booty widely and freely; and yet you may scrape the state of New York with a fine tooth comb without finding a man who ever took one of his ill-gotten dollars. Here for instance are a Judge on the bench, the editor of a prominent New York journal, and a "reform" leader in the Albany legislature whom Tweed claims as accomplices, and now the torrent of their virtuous indignation is a sight both grand and beautiful to be hold. Well, we shall know more about it later.

The climax of the life insurance proceedings which I have noticed from time to time has at last been reached in the publication of the long looked for report of the committee appointed to investigate the "Equitable." This young giant of a company which in its eighteen years of existence time been the real focus of the blows aimed from all sides at the life insurance interest. Jealousy, like death, loves a shining mark, and as a consequence a number of lesser corporations have for many months sought in various ways to undermine public confidence in their too powerful rival, and to injure its business. To remove any doubts concerning its condition which might result from such attacks or from the general distrust occasioned by the failures of last season, the officers of the Equitable in January last made the request of nine New York business men of the highest standing, headed by ex-Governor Morgan of this state, that they would act as a special committee to probe the affairs of the society to the bottom, and ventilate every corporate act of its life. The commission was accepted, and three months having been given to an unsparing scrutiny of its accounts and condition, the results thereof are embodied in the comprehensive report just published—a report both critical and thorough, and closing with an emphatic declaration not only "that the Society is solvent beyond question, and that the policy-holders are amply secured in their investment," but also that its unparalleled growth reflects the highest credit on its officers, and places the "Equitable" in the front rank of institutions of its kind.

This effectually disposes of all detractions of this company, for the members of this committee are so far above suspicion of partiality of favoritism that their dictum is accepted here and everywhere as absolutely correct.

A new enemy to man, and in this longitude at least, a deadly one, is being developed in the shape of the ordinary cat, at whose door must be laid a number of recent deaths, and for whose suppression stringent measures are now proposed. So great is the alarm in the region of Fulton Ferry among the restaurant keepers and market people that an association has been formed which has offered a reward of "Fifty cents, dead or alive," for every cat brought in. The fish market has long been famous for its cats, each stallkeeper having a number of feline pensioners which answered to their names and received regular rations. But they have increased and multiplied till they have become a terrible nuisance. Thieving, mangy, quarrelsome and noisy, the atmosphere is redolent of the pungent odor of cats, the roofs, cellars, corridors and fences are pervaded with cats, the tempest tossed mariners temporarily sojourning in the adjacent boarding house cannot sleep for the pests, and fill the air with flying boots and portable furniture. The residents are in sore trouble. They say the cats are worse than the rats, with whom they have apparently formed an unnatural alliance for offensive assaults on anything and everything eatable they can lay their paws on. Worse than all, the New York cat, in addition to all his other vices, is becoming addicted to hydrophobia of an aggravated character. This puts the cap sheaf on his accumulated offences, and a long suffering public having risen against him, he has suddenly become an equal share with the Spitze dog in the general enmity and fear.

I think I am safe in asserting that it has come within the experience of all of us to see men run away from the Ten Commandments, avoid them, and leave them severely alone; but that any one should be moved by his affection to run away with them must be acknowledged to be a genuine novelty. This, however, is what some unconscionable specimen of humanity has done with the elaborately engrossed parchment which formed the central ornament of one of our New York synagogues. In spite of the commotion which this outrage has created, its perpetrator is still unknown; but his coolness, however he is, in carrying off bodily the injunction against stealing, is worthy of mention.

Of the two great ocean steamers which went ashore near Long Branch, during the winter, the Amerique of the French line has just been gotten safely off by skillful and persistent efforts, and is now lying in the dry dock receiving the slight repairs necessitated by her misfortune. The Rutland, which was a Belgian boat, proved less staunch, and has become a total wreck. The New York agent of the French line gave this week a grand dinner to the captain of the wreckers who saved the Amerique.

The Japanese are the most progressive of all the Orientals and are without doubt the best liked by Uncle Sam's nephews. The almond eyed nation has, however, made rather an inauspicious entry into the American learned professions, the first Japanese lawyer ever admitted to this bar, Yamada by name, lying at present under an indictment for an attempt to blackmail.

The smooth current of the amusement season has been slightly ruffled this week; largely, no one will be surprised to hear, by Anna Dickinson who suddenly, on Monday night, gave notice to the proprietor of the theatre at which she has been acting, that she should not put in an appearance. A newspaper quarrel followed, and the "Crown of Thorns" is killed dead.

On the same evening a certain Miss Lenox was to have made her debut at the Lyceum in the part of "Camille." At the appointed hour a crowd of ticket holders surrounded the entrance of the building which they were somewhat dumbfounded to find closed and dark. After some waiting a tumult arose which finally penetrated the green room of the theatre, where the fair debutante was eagerly completing her toilet, unconscious of anything amiss. When it became evident that the manager of the evening had failed to come to time, and that no performance was to be had, there followed rather more of a scene than though the regular programme had been followed out—a scene in which distracted supernumeraries, a hysterical actress and a disgusted public sustained the principal parts.

Not less interesting was a little episode at Gilmore's Garden, in which Barnum's big elephant "Borsen" who has only been in America a few days, filled the chief role. Borsen has the reputation of being the biggest elephant in captivity, and he feels his dignity accordingly. When, therefore, he was brought into this "blasted country," and actually shut up in the same cage with three plebian elephants of smaller size, his feelings were so outraged that he found it necessary to pick up his keeper with his trunk and chuck him a couple of blocks in order to show a proper resentment. Further reflection convinced him that this was not a sufficient vindication of his honor, so he knocked down the wooden walls of his domicile and the cage of lions, and then galloped around the establishment for an hour or so, when he was finally captured.

DR. WISHART'S PINE TREE TAR CORDIAL

A Sterling Vegetable Remedy
Which Eradicates
DISEASES OF THE THROAT AND LUNGS, DYSPEPSIA, GRAVEL, PILES, URINARY TROUBLES, NERVOUS DEBILITY, PALPITATION OF THE HEART, TORPIDITY OF THE LIVER, CONSTIPATION, SCROFULOUS AFFECTIONS, AND FEMALE COMPLAINTS.

For nearly a quarter of a century this sterling preparation has been effecting cures of the various diseases to which it is adapted, and thousands of persons, of perfect reliability, in all classes of society have borne evidence to its wondrous remedial efficacy.

As a remedy for diseases of the Throat and Lungs it has achieved a popularity rivalled by that of few proprietary remedies. Experience has shown that for those who are troubled with weakness of the Lungs it is the best possible protective against Consumption, and it may be relied on with certainty to eradicate Bronchitis, Asthma, Croup, Diptheria, and Soreness of the Chest.

Coughs of the most obstinate kind are speedily overcome by it, and since a simple cough is very prone to develop into serious Inflammation of the Lungs, the early use of Dr. WISHART'S PINE TREE TAR CORDIAL is earnestly recommended, as it invariably prevents the further progress of the disease.

Dyspepsia, Loss of Appetite, Torpidity of the Liver and of the Kidneys are promptly overcome by this superb vegetable corrective, which not only regulates but strengthens the organs of digestion, as well as those of the urinary and biliary secretions. It imparts unwonted relish for the food, and, by promoting digestion and assimilation, enriches the blood, which is the natural motor of vital energy and nutriment to the system.

Dr. L. O. C. Wishart's Pine Tree Tar Cordial thoroughly regulates the Bowels, removes Blind and Bleeding Piles, banishes from the circulation dropsical and all other impurities, and effectually counteracts a tendency to Gravel. It also entirely obviates the weaknesses incident to females.

Dr. L. O. C. Wishart's Pine Tree Tar Cordial is no mere placebo. It is a standard medicine, and has been repeatedly recognized as such by the press and members of the medical profession, who emphatically endorse the popular verdict long since rendered in its favor.

Sold by Druggists everywhere.

NEW ORLEANS, April 19

The Packard Legislature met in session last night and adjourned the following, on motion of Mr. Bell, grays, of Madison:

The members of the Senate of Louisiana, assembled in session in the State-house, in the city of New Orleans, this the 19th day of April, 1877, reflected the following statement of the present views of the general conditions of affairs in the State:

Whereas, There is no considerable faith in the legality and validity of the returns of S. B. Packard and the Congressional ticket of which he is the head, and the Governor and Lieutenant Governor with whom he is associated, and in fact conferring the seat of the majority of the members of this body;

Whereas, That the inauguration of the legal Governor, and the assembling of the State-House by the majority of the members of this Body, is the most important business immediately before the people of the State, and the country at large; and

Whereas, The Democratic party has peacefully made known and the National Administration has fully recognized its intention of not Compromising, in the slightest degree, the rights of the people, who have expressed themselves through the ballot-box, and have confirmed their action by the supreme test of possession, which, under the Constitution and laws of the United States, is conclusive evidence of right, and which is the only guarantee of peace and prosperity; and

Whereas, The Democratic party has, in its relations to the Republican party, used only suggested methods which directly tend to an abandonment of the contest for possession of right or justice. I respectfully submit that the questions at issue in Louisiana cannot be disposed of by mere expedients. The claim of individuals to office are of little consequence when weighed against the rights and liberty of a majority of the people. If a lawful government in Louisiana can be overthrown by domestic violence with the organized power of the National government, originally called into existence for the express purpose, among others, of preventing such occurrence, what States in the Union may not hereafter be subject to similar revolutions? Are the American people willing to see the president established?

Earnestly requesting your immediate action on the facts presented I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,

D. D. PACKARD, Governor.

What may well be termed a wonder in the homology and mechanical skill is described in a foreign scientific journal, namely: A gold hunting watch, which, in addition to being a time-keeper of the utmost precision, with chronometer adjustments, compensation balance and cylindrical spring, advises on the dial-plate the following: The number of the month, the days, hours, minutes and seconds, as in an ordinary watch; the moon's age, the day of the month—in addition to the

We take the following items from the Little Traverse Republican.

One of the inmates of the Convent at Cross Village, committed suicide by hanging himself one day last week.

On last Monday, while the woods surrounding Petoskey were all on fire and the school house together with other buildings in that place were threatened with destruction, Mr. O. N. Wentworth on the roof of the school building we are informed, in the endeavor to saturate the roof with water, lost his balance and fell to the ground injuring him it is thought, mortally.

The schooner Ellen Stevenson, which has lain on our harbor during the winter is now being put in readiness for use. She is a trim, staunch little craft, and Capt. Sherman knows just how to handle her. She will keep our harbor for a short time in a few days, repainted and in fine style. We wish the captain success, and may his vessel take the waves during the season in safety.

MIRACULOUS ESCAPE.—On Monday last, while the P. M. train on the G. R. & I. R. R. was on her way up, many very near meeting with a severe catastrophe. As near as we can learn, while the train was passing between Mio Lake and Crawford station, a tree some two feet in diameter fell, striking the rear car just over the forward trucks, crushing that end of the car into kindling wood. Fortunately the tree was free from limbs and fell diagonally with the train which careened it to one side. Strange as it may seem, but two or three passengers were injured, and they but slightly.

It seems that war in Europe is inevitable. No hope of a peaceful settlement is now entertained at Constantinople. The Turkish generalissimo has gone to the Danube to assume the immediate command. Where it will end no one can conjecture.

LATER.—War has been declared.

He was overtaken and made to enter the jail by the same hole that he escaped from, he being compelled to remove his cool before he could squeeze through. He is to be taken to Jackson Ex's week.

TO THE PEOPLE.—Exigencies like the present come in the history of [illegible] bor call for the united and prompt action of the entire people of the Pine Lake region. The Messrs. Starke have done and are doing nobly, generously, in dredging out the channel. It seems, and is, disproportionately large as compared with what are doing to help them. The work on the part of the people has been confined to a few enterprising citizens of Charlevoix, and a few up lake folks. But the spirit ought to be spontaneous and general, when the bread and butter of every man on Pine Lake and South Arm is concerned in it. There is work yet to be done in securing the channel, and we call upon the people to do their duty to themselves by helping the matter along.

THE Elk Rapids Business Case.—A suit had been brought against Perry Andrus, supervisor of Mancelona, for accepting a bribe to remove the county seat from this village to a more centrical geographical center of Antrim county, but now withdrawn or dismissed. This was withdrawn on condition that Andrus should make good said pecuniary loss over his own signature, of all the circumstances. This statement shows the Andrews E. Palmer, of Kalkaska, had contracted to sell forty acres of land to Perry Andrews and to John B. Barton, supervisor of Helena, on the condition that the county seat should be located on a spot adjoining said land before June 1, 1877, the contract to be void and void in case of failure to secure the location of the county seat. Wm. Getty, supervisor of Forest Home, was subsequently admitted to a share in the profitable transaction, and overtures were made to a fourth supervisor in order to secure his vote, but he proved more honorable than the others, refused to accept the bribe, and exposed the scheme, which would have invested the county in an expense of $15,000 or $20,000 for the sake of getting money in the pockets of a few schemers.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

FOREIGN.

According to a Calcutta telegram of the 23d, a serious outbreak of cholera had occurred at Akyab. Fully 30 per cent. of the European population had perished.

On the 24th, the Czar of Russia issued a manifesto to the Russian army and people, in which, after setting forth the causes of offense on the part of Turkey and the efforts made by Russia in the interests of peace and humanity, he formally declared war, and issued an order for the crossing of the frontier. Simultaneous with this manifesto, Prince Gortschakoff issued a circular to the Powers, giving the reasons for the precipitation of hostilities. The Turkish Charge d' Affaires at St. Petersburg was also furnished his passports. The advance of the Russian army, consisting of 17,000 men, crossed the Pruth into Roumania, under the leadership of the Grand Duke Nicholas. A proclamation was issued announcing the invasion. The Roumanian Government, not having received a preliminary notification, declared that it yielded to force and directed its troops to fall back to avoid a conflict. It is stated that the immediate object of the advance was to protect the railway bridge at Barboschi, where the first collision was expected.

On the 25th, an Imperial order was issued declaring the Provinces of Bessarabia, Kerson, Taurida and Crimea in a state of siege. The Russians had crossed the frontier of Asiatic Turkey at Alexandropol, on the route to Kars. Galatz and Braila had been occupied by the Russians, and the important railway bridge at these points secured. Several Turkish ironclads were moving up the Danube to attack the bridge.

According to Berlin and Vienna telegrams of the 25th, the Powers would not attempt to mediate between Turkey and Russia until after one or two serious engagements had been fought on the Danube.

The municipality of Moscow voted funds, on the 25th, for 1,000 beds for wounded soldiers, and also 1,000,000 rubles for additional hospital appliances. The Russian Imperial family have given 40,000,000 rubles from their private purses for the expenses of the war.

In reply to the demand of the Porte for permission to cross the frontier, Servia has declared that she should maintain strict neutrality in the war between Turkey and Russia, so long as her territory was not violated.

Up to the morning of the 25th, 50,000 Russians had crossed over into Roumania.

Safvet Pasha, the Turkish Minister of Foreign Affairs, sent a circular dispatch to the Powers in reply to the Russian manifesto on the 26th. He protests against the declaration of war, and sets out the efforts made by Turkey to improve the position of her Christian subjects and satisfy the demands of the Christian Powers. In the absence, therefore, of proper provocation, Safvet says the Porte cannot recognize in fact the motive of Russia's attack, and consequently appeals to the Treaty of Paris and the mediation of the guaranteeing Powers.

Servia notified Turkey, on the 26th, that she would resist by force any attempt on the part of the Turkish Army to occupy Gladova.

The Prince of Montenegro, on the 26th, issued a circular to the Powers, in which he states that the negotiations with Turkey were broken off because of his demand that the Herzegovinian refugees be restored to their homes. The Sultan, on the 26th, issued a proclamation to his army, announcing the declaration of war by Russia. He invokes the assistance of God to repel the invader, and promises that the Nation shall care for the wives and children of those who fight her battles. Should it become necessary, he would himself go to the army and assume the standard of the Khalifizated the Sultanat, and would sacrifice his life for the honor and independence of his country.

The plague has appeared at Reshd, on the southern shore of the Caspian Sea, in Persia. There were 175 deaths at Reshd from the plague between the 16th and 23d of April.

Reports recently received at the Treasury Department in Washington show that the counterfeiting of notes, principally those of a denomination of one dollar, is increasing rapidly. Reports from the Rhode Island mention the coinage of counterfeit five-dollar pieces and some arrests.

A man, named John Krupple, died in Philadelphia, on the 21st, of hydrophobia. He was bitten in the throat by his dog three months before, but the wound cauterized and it apparently healed immediately. No fears were felt until a few days before his death, when the usual symptoms of hydrophobia appeared and the patient soon died in great agony.

Two little Boston (Mass.) boys named Dudley Kimball (aged four and a half years) and Stephen Orr (aged six years and a half), on the 21st, were playing in a lot, when young Kimball, saying "I will do you no harm," proceeded to deliberately remove the boy's scalp, that fell through the temple. The victim had inflicted two horrible wounds before the boy was prevented from doing more.

The Chicago Tribune issues of the 21st publishes crop reports from 102 counties in Illinois, Indiana, Michigan, Wisconsin, Minnesota, Kentucky, Tennessee and Missouri. According to these reports, wheat seems to be unusually promising, in the 459 counties covered, 126 are reported excellent, 304 average, and only 29 poor. Peaches are likely to be at least a partial failure; in 180 counties they are reported injured or wholly destroyed; in 191 a fair or an average crop is prophesied, and in only 61 are they pe ensing. Apples promise very finely, 67 counties reporting a fine crop, 309 an average crop, and but 47 a poor or partial crop. Cherries and smaller fruits seem to promise about an average crop.

A recent Washington dispatch says the Postmaster-General had issued an order that hereafter appointments of Post-Office clerks, route-agents, mail-route messengers, or local agents, shall be made only for six months, and that at the expiration of this period no reappointment will be made unless the appointee pass a satisfactory examination.

The National Exchange Bank, of Minneapolis, Minn., closed its doors on the 24th. It was stated that the financial embarrassment of its President, H. Miller, of Troy, was the chief cause of the suspension.

Gov. Hartranft, of Pennsylvania, as Commander-in-Chief of the Grand Army of the Republic, has issued a general order designating May 30 as a Memorial Day. Wherever there are no posts of the Grand Army to lead in the good work, the Commander-in-Chief, in behalf of their surviving comrades, asks the citizens to take steps to decorate the graves of the gallant dead, and secure a proper observance of the day.

The New York canals are to be opened for navigation on the 5th of May.

The President has appointed George Schneider, of Chicago, Minister Resident to the Republic of Switzerland.

Capt. Geo. Barker, aged eighty-five, and believed to be the oldest Free-Mason in the United States, died at Hudson, N.Y., on the 22d; and at Rochester, N. Y., on the same day, William E. Lathrop died, at the age of eighty-three, having been a Mason for sixty years, and being, at the time of his death, Commander of the Grand Commandery of the United States.

Ex-President and Mrs. Grant arrived in Washington on the evening of the 23d.

Senator Blaine was interviewed by a New York Herald reporter on the evening of the 23d, and stated that he had no expression of opinion to make with regard to the change of political affairs in Louisiana. Being inquired of as to a statement made by a San Francisco newspaper that he had prepared, and intended to introduce, resolutions at the next session of Congress, repressing double of Mr. Hayes' election, and proposing a new consideration of the question by a tribunal to consist of the Chief-Justices of all the States, Mr. Blaine said there was not the slightest foundation for the story.

Gov. Packard issued a lengthy address to the Republicans of Louisiana, on the 26th, and, early on the morning of that day, he and his adherents, except one Metropolitan policeman, left the State-House. At noon the Legislature adjourned from Odd Fellows' Hall to the St. Louis Hotel, where it reassembled and proceeded with its business.

Caleb Cushing, ex-Minister to Spain, arrived at New York on the 26th.

The Massachusetts House of Representatives, on the 20th, rejected—117 to 106—the Prohibitory Liquor bill, which had previously passed the Senate.

In the Nicholls (Louisiana) Legislature, on the 21st, a number of the Packard members of the Senate and House took their seats. Seven Democratic members who had been seated subject to contest yielded their seats to, and introduced, the colored Republican members who claimed the seats on the face of the returns. Ex-Gov. Warmoth made a speech, in which he said: "We have been whipped in the battle, but have at least preserved our self-respect in an honorable contest, and are prepared now to offer our allegiance to the only existing government, and to fairly cooperate in anything which may be suggested."

The Louisiana Commissioners returned to Washington on the 24th, and visited the Executive Mansion during the session of the Cabinet. Business was suspended, when there was an informal conversation between them and the Cabinet respecting their mission. The Commissioners furnished the final report of their proceedings to the President, who returned thanks for the satisfactory way in which they had discharged their duties. The Commissioners are said to speak in warm terms of the kind manner by which they were received in New Orleans by both parties, and appear to be perfectly satisfied with the result of their mission.

The bill prohibiting betting on elections, postselling at races, etc., passed the New York Senate on the 26th—yeas, 23; nays, 5.

Gen. Auger announces as follows, in a telegram of the 24th, the withdrawal of the Federal troops from the vicinity of the State-House in New Orleans: "The troops stationed at the Odessa Road, in this city, vacated it at twelve o'clock meridian to-day, and proceeded to Jackson Barracks. The troops in the city building is the immediate vicinity of the State-House that has been occupied by troops during the past year, and not once during that time have the troops emptied into the State-House to any part of it."

The Louisiana Legislature, in joint session on the 24th, elected George H. Snodfield Secretary of State, and Thomas Anderson Auditor of Public Accounts, the two being ballotted for. Wm. J. Leake, Jr.

The report of the Louisiana Committee appointed to proceed to Grand Sun Odessa, April 20, and consisting of Gen. Sheridan as chairman, and Messrs. Hoar and Logan as members, to witness the election and count of the vote, has been received by the President, and is now in the hands of the Committee at their room. They are still closeted with the President, and it is understood that the report is voluminous, and that they will be engaged for some days in preparing their report. The Committee have been in session every day since their arrival in this city, and have examined a large number of witnesses, and carefully considered the evidence in each case. The Committee have had no communication with any person outside of the Committee, with the exception of the President, and will not be in a position to say when they will report to the House of Representatives. It is understood that the Committee will report in favor of the seating of the Nicholls Legislature, and the recognition of the Nicholls State Government.

OUR NEW YORK LETTER.

New York, May 5, 1877.

Local events have this week largely taken their color from the bursting war cloud in Europe. Remote as is the actual scene of action from us, we can scarcely be said to disinterested spectators to the developments which the last few days have inaugurated. Despite the expressed intention of the European powers to hold themselves aloof from the strife between Russia and Turkey, and thus prevent the strife from being more than a local one, the probability is everywhere felt to be strong, that unless the last abject appeal of Turkey to the treaty of Paris should prove of some effect—and nothing could be more unlikely—it will not be many months before England Austria, Germany, and perhaps France and Italy, will be found ranged upon the side of one or the other of the present combatants. The effect upon this country of the stubborn general war that would follow is easily to be seen. The production of provisions and of manufactured articles practically ceasing throughout Europe, demands upon the United States, the only great producing nation left with its hands free, for supplies of every variety, would tax our capacity to the utmost, and give such a stimulus to our manufactures as not even our own war furnished.

With these ideas uppermost in mind, Wall street and the heavy manufacturing interests have naturally been feverish and excited. Gold has gone up three or four figures and breadstuffs have followed suit. I presume few are so greedy and inhuman as to desire to see the whole of Europe plunged in the horrors of war; but certain it is that none of us can help it if such a state of things is brought about, and therefore need not hesitate to reap the temporary harvest which it would place ready to our hands

The Russian fleet, which brought the Grand Duke to this country, and which has formed the great attraction to the ferry passengers on the North River for several weeks, shows very evidently that it has heard of the disturbance on the other side. On receipt of the news of the declaration of war the ships' officers scoured the town for such members of their crews as, having been allowed leave to go on shore, had disported themselves with the characteristic abandon of Jack Tar the world over, had got drunk and been sent to various limbos by the police justices. The weather beaten truants were reclaimed as rapidly as possible, their fines being paid out of the treasury of his Imperial majesty, the Czar of all the Russias, and the fleet now lies with steam up awaiting and rather expecting a telegraphic recall to the Black Sea.

With the returning green of our parks and trees attention falls naturally upon the plant and seed interests, which now begin to be in enormous activity. Few people realize what a business is done about here in the raising and selling of flowers and seeds. Flower growers estimate that within a radius of thirty miles about the New York city hall there are over $10,000,000 invested in the growing of plants by professional gardeners, large and small, and that their annual sales—exclusive of cut flowers—reach 2,000,000, half of which, or more, belongs to the Spring trade. Besides this, there is probably not less than $1,000,000 worth of seeds sold from their city between January and June of each year. The growth of the seed and bulb house interest has of course occasioned a tremendous multiplication of varieties. I know of one seed house alone which has 500 named varieties of potatoes and other vegetables and flowering plants receive proportionate attention.

A very pleasant result of the concentration of this trade about New York is the cheapness of cut flowers in the city. Besides the numerous regular florist there is on most every busy street corner a little flower stand where, from the first warm sunshine to the first snow squall, pretty, fragrant little bunches of green and color can be brought for a song. And to the credit of New Yorkers it must be said that busy as they are, these flowers stands get very fair patronage. Throughout his hurrying day in the heat and dust of summer, many a clerk, banker and merchant, and above all, the wild, untamable broker of Wall street, would feel quite lost without a bunch of violets or pansies, or a rosebud and sprig of geranium in his button hole or on his office desk.

The tidal wave which for several years past has been sweeping the finest retail business of the city from its old moorings in lower Broadway to various uptown locations, has now carried away another landmark in the great photographic atelier of Sarony, the pioneer, and for many years the leader, in this department of Artedeans the arts Every visitor to New York knows the old location opposite the Grand Central hotel, and even those who never enjoyed an inspection of the beauties of the place cannot fail to be familiar with the bold and characteristic signature which appears beneath all the best portraits of native and foreign celebrities which are scattered through the country. The new quarters on Union Square are being made a palace of this art, every luxury and convenience which taste and experience can suggest, being supplied with unstinted liberality; for "Sarony's" has always been first in elegance as well as art, and its proprietor is not the man to fall behind in the universal march of improvement. Among the other accessories for the convenience of the public which he is placing in the new building is a steam elevator from the street to his elegant quarters.

Several delegations have already set out from this city and Philadelphia for the purpose of being present at the semi-centennial celebration of the Pope's elevation to the bishopric. This jubilee, as it is called, will be held at Rome on May 21st, and will be celebrated with immense pomp and splendor—provided that the old Pontiff lives another three weeks, a matter of some little uncertainty. The official reports of his health are always flattering, but private despatches show his condition to be quite precarious. It seems to be the continued determination of the American faithful that His Holiness shall not suffer from temporal want during his declining years. One of the deputations above referred to carries $20,000 Peter's Pence as a gift to Pius IX, and another $40,000. If the pilgrims from the rest of the world do as well as ours, the Vatican will not be in the Sheriff's hands during the life of its present occupant.

Everybody has heard of Calcraft, the famous English executioner, who, during his period of office has probably launched into eternity more human beings than did ever a red Indian or frontier desperado. Everybody, however, does not know that New York has a corresponding functionary. Our "Jack Ketch," who also officiates in Brooklyn, where he resides, is a quiet, black-haired, swarthy man, who has pursued his unattractive calling here for about twenty-five years He is a carpenter by trade, and doubtless rose from building scaffolds to operating them. What his real name is I cannot learn, as he persists in calling himself by an assumed name to shield his family from the odium which still clings about the hangman's office. He has already swung off nineteen victims, which number would have been twenty by this time but for the death in prison of the Jewish murderer Rubenstein last year. His fee for doing the disagreeable job is $200 per criminal. It's a good round price, but it doesn't strike me that I should care to compete with him for the business, even if I were sure of getting it at the same rates. As our criminal matters stand at this writing, I don't know of anyone who is awaiting his kind offices.

DISEASES OF THE THROAT AND LUNGS, DYSPEPSIA, GRAVEL, PILES, URINARY TROUBLES, NERVOUS DEBILITY, PALPITATION OF THE HEART, TORPIDITY OF THE LIVER, CONSTIPATION, SCROFULOUS AFFECTIONS, AND FEMALE COMPLAINTS.

For nearly a quarter of a century this sterling preparation has been effecting cures of the various diseases to which it is adapted, and thousands of persons, of perfect reliability, in all classes of society have borne evidence to its wondrous remedial efficacy.

As a remedy for diseases of the Throat and Lungs it has achieved a popularity rivalled by that of few proprietary remedies. Experience has shown that for those who are troubled with weakness of the Lungs it is the best possible protective against Consumption, and it may be relied on with certainty to eradicate Bronchitis, Asthma, Croup, Diptheria, and Soreness of the Chest.

Coughs of the most obstinate kind are speedily overcome by it, and since a simple cough is very prone to develop into serious inflammation of the Lungs, the early use of DR. WISHART'S PINE TREE TAR CORDIAL is earnestly recommended, as it invariably prevents the further progress of the disease.

Dyspepsia, Loss of Appetite, Torpidity of the Liver and of the Kidneys are promptly overcome by this superb vegetable corrective, which not only regulates but strengthens the organs of digestion, as well as those of the urinary and biliary secretions. It imparts unwonted relish for the food, and, by promoting digestion and assimilation, enriches the blood, which is the natural motor of vital energy and nutriment to the system.

Dr. L. G. C. Wishart's Pine Tree Tar Cordial thoroughly regulates the Bowels, removes Blind and Bleeding Piles, banishes from the circulation dropsical and all other impurities, and effectually counteracts a tendency to Gravel. It also entirely obviates the weaknesses incident to females.

Dr. L. G. C. Wishart's Pine Tree Tar Cordial is no mere placebo. It is a standard medicine, and has been repeatedly recognized as such by the press and members of the medical profession, who emphatically endorse the popular verdict long since rendered in its favor.

COMPLIMENTARY ADDRESS TO GOV. PACKARD.

NEW ORLEANS, April 24, 1877.

The following address was adopted in joint caucus of the Senate and House by the Republican members of the General Assembly of Louisiana:

To GOV. S. B. PACKARD:

We reverence and appreciate the fidelity with which you have sought to carry out the obligations which you assumed when, in the presence of a legally-organized quorum of both branches of the General Assembly, after a formal Constitutional amendment, the notice, you took the oath of office as Governor of the State of Louisiana. The organization and active co-operation of the Republican members of the General Assembly have been with you to seal your associates in the State Government in your struggle to maintain your authority against overwhelming obstacles at home and abroad. One of the first acts of the General Assembly was to pass a joint resolution calling upon the President of the United States, under Sec. 4, Art. 4 of the Constitution of the United States, to accord the legal Government support against domestic violence, which threatened its overthrow. In response to this appeal, after some delay, no order was issued by President Grant, stating both that you had been legally declared Governor of the State; that the Supreme Court violently set up by your opponent was destitute of legal authority, and declaring that, if necessity for recognition should arise, recognition would be given to you and not to Nicholls. Encouraged by the expression there and out that the Government acquiesced to be the legal Government and Executive of the State, and that a Democratic Senate would be recognized by the President, members of the General Assembly of Louisiana, most loyal, although encountering many hardships, patiently awaited the action of the National Government. Rumors, which soon took shape and form, were circulated that the over-zealous friends of the President-elect, for whose success hundreds of devoted Republicans in Louisiana had given their votes, had bargained to give away the States of Louisiana and South Carolina to your political opponents. The outgoing President failed to take further action for the protection of our General Assembly. Reluctantly, therefore, and only after repeated attempts to organize by the action of the Democratic members, a majority of the members of the General Assembly, which, though numbering the waver of undoubted legal rights on our part, was accepted by the Republican members in deference to the understood wishes of the President. That proposition was rejected by our opponents, who in spite submitted a plan flagrantly unjust and in violation of the laws. The resolutions adopted by the General Assembly in joint caucus, which have been published, have explained by what means of coercion, persuasion and threats, the members of the Democratic organizing assembly to act as an individual capacity, but working all the power and influence of the political agents of the President sent to the State for a specific purpose, induced a sufficient number of Legislators to give to the opposing party a majority of members legally returned elected. The action of the Democratic majority in the joint session of the President, made at the request of Nicholls, directing the withdrawal of the United States troops, and virtually to remove the organized force.

Three days and more that have passed since we took possession as Governor, no word of encouragement or recognition or support has been accorded by a by the National Administration. On the contrary, a disposition has been clearly manifested to encourage, strengthen and maintain by all direct and indirect means the Government of your opponent, already so strong in the unsurpassing armed force it has rendered to its support in the Capital of the State. Under these circumstances, whilst abating none of our belief in the rightfulness of our cause, we cannot but feel that forces which neither you nor ourselves are able to resist render it impossible for us to enforce your rights at this present time. To attempt to do so would only add to the blood which has already been fruitlessly shed in defense of the righteous cause in this State. We therefore are constrained to advise that for the present you withdraw your petition from actively asserting your constitutional rights, trusting to the future to vindicate the righteousness of your cause.

[SEN. PACKARD TO THE REPUBLICANS OF HIS STATE.

STATE OF LOUISIANA, EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT, NEW ORLEANS, La., April 25, 1877.

To the Republicans of Louisiana:

On this day, the fifteenth anniversary of the surrender of New Orleans to the forces of the United States, it becomes my duty to announce to you that the aid and [illegible] Government has been withdrawn from the Republicans of Louisiana, and that a Democratic administration, in form [illegible] in the point of usurping the control of affairs in this State. I recall the circumstances of the Electoral campaign only to thank you for the fidelity to principle which you then displayed. The Republican party, as you know, entered upon the canvass united, and stronger than ever before. It has enlisted under its banners an influential class of native-born citizens of old and [illegible] residents, who, to their honor be it said, still maintain faithful to the principles of the party, opposed and the Government they supported. I was further strengthened by the absence from the State of the opposition of that element whose previous adherence to the cause had brought a new discipline. These causes combined to bring about the remarkable success achieved by the Republican party in all the doubtful parishes, with one exception, even in those the white population preponderates, and which gave such majority in the Legislature. Except where open violence prevailed, our State ticket carried every parish in the State, and elects a number of parishes which, in the last Legislature, were represented by Democratic members.

I briefly summarize the historical events that have since occurred. The General Assembly met on the third January last, organized with a full legal quorum in both houses, passed laws which were approved by the then Executive of the State, and on the 30 of January last canvassed and declared the vote for Governor. At the time the canvass was agitated by doubt as to the result of the Presidential election. With the knowledge that Samuel J. Tilden might possibly become President of the United States, and with no hope of success otherwise, my opponent in the late contest established a rival Legislature, and went through the form of an inauguration. Under that time some of the Legislators, I am informed, which Mr. Tilden's assistance of a considerable number of Democratic members, and possibly gubernatorial candidate.

In the terms that followed Gen. Nicholls and his subordinates were encouraged by the unchecked refusal of the Government to recognize the State Government, or to respond to the constitutional call of the Legislature, and thereby compromised the legality of neither.

On the 5th of January, I had scarcely taken my seat in the Executive chair when the White ... express to remind insurrection, and by a coup ... assume such possession of the Supreme Court, the mint and the statues of the Metropolitan Police, all located at the Capitol. This overt act, ... from [illegible] constituted, with other ... the practical effect of which was to confirm the insurgents in the advantages which they had gained, and prescribed any effort to dispossess them.

On the inauguration of President Hayes, the State authorities made preparations to organize a militia force for the defense of the State Government. Gen. Nicholls' police seized upon the ... recruiting officers and imprisoned them for treason, without benefit of bail or ... Judges corpus. I telegraphed this fact to President Hayes, asking if this was a violation of the ... status quo, and, if not, whether the release of ... these men by force, all civil remedies having been exhausted, would be so considered. The President replied: "Your dispatch of the 28th is received. The Secretary of War has been telegraphed to this effect." A Commission shortly visit Louisiana. In the meantime the President desires that the situation remain unchanged.

The Commission came. In the meantime, the Nicholls Government had eventuated into shape. So far from permitting the situation to remain unchanged, it had broken into the Texas ... offices, seized upon the Custom-house, the ... control of the State institutions, and had strengthened itself on all sides. Notwithstanding the action of the Commission found the elected city members of the House, one ... less than a quorum. One at least of the members ... claimed by them was absent on the last day of January last. No Republican or Independent member would consent to act with the Nicholls House and subsequently, in order to obtain even the appearance of an organization, the last ... were compelled to call to their and three men who were defeated at the polls, whose election had not been previously claimed. This inquiry, therefore, was pertinent in this connection: If a Returning Board organism was so effectual for Nicholls' claim, why was it that such a quorum was ignored while it remained faithful to the legal Government of the State? That Government had a Returning Board quorum from the day on which the General Assembly convened, and the Legislature, duly organized, remained in legal existence till disintegrated by the direct action of the Commission.

This result having been achieved, it is a matter of record that congratulatory messages were exchanged between the President and his Commission. On the following day the President, by a formal order, made public though the press, directed that the United States troops occupying a building in the vicinity of the State-House should be withdrawn to their barracks. These troops had been placed there to Presidential order without a request of the Governor to protect the Returning Board while counting the vote for Nicholls.

I briefly believe that but the legal Government must been recognized, it could have sustained itself without the withdrawal of the troops. The said the order for withdrawal, issued under the circumstances, and in the manner that it was issued, clearly indicated that even the moral support which the legal Government of Louisiana should have received from the National Administration would be denied. But the General Assembly continued in session in the State-House. I should have deemed it my duty to have adjourned and defended the Government to the last, notwithstanding the withdrawal of the troops, but for the Legislature disintegrated and its prospect of present [illegible] week was fried briefly by asking you longer to continue to aid me in the struggle that I have for him maintained. I therefore announce to you that I am compelled to abdicate, for the present, from all active assertion of my Executive powers. I warn none of my legal rights, but yield only to superior forces.

I am not wholly discouraged by the fact that, one by one, the Republican State Governments of the South have been forced to succumb to force, or fraud, or policy. Louisiana, the first State rehabilitated after the war, is the last State where Government has failed. Sooner or later it will be among the first to raise itself again to the place of equality and honest representation. I advise that you peaceably accept organization, and continue to battle for the rights of citizenship and free government. We strive for these, and not for a man or men.

If error or misgovernment overcome that the people themselves have made, and the cruel sufferings you have made, and the cruel sufferings you have undergone, to maintain Republican principles in Louisiana, have all been unavailing. To those who have so gallantly stood to me in this long contest that we have passed through, I tender my heartfelt thanks. I commend your future fortunes and a firm trust that eventually right and justice will prevail.

MECHANICAL AND SCIENTIFIC.

—A new form of propeller for ocean steamships has been patented in England, and is on exhibition in Liverpool. It is criticised something after the style of the stern-wheels sometimes used on river steamboats, and the claim is that it cannot be broken or lost, and at the same time will give the ship greater speed for the same amount of applied power than the ordinary form of screw.

—An item of evidence regarding the growth of coral is furnished by a Melbourne paper. A piece of the ordinary species, measuring about five inches in height, six inches in diameter at the top, and about two inches at the base was taken off the submarine cable near Port Darwin. It is perfectly formed, and the base bears the distinct impression of the cable—a few fibres of the cell rope, used as a sheath for the telegraph wire, still adhering to it. As the cable has been laid only four years, it is evident that this specimen must have grown to its present height in that time, which seems to prove that the growth of coral is much more rapid than has been supposed.

—An improved French pavement system consists in the employment of wood distorted in line fragments, of as great a length as possible, in the construction of rides and bridle paths, carriage drives, and in fact streets and roads of all kinds; also in the employment of the same kind of wood, but shorter length, in constructing foot paths of all kinds for promenades and gardens. It is also adopted, as well if designed with pitch or with antiseptic material, as a cushion for supporting the sleepers of railways. The employment of such disintegrated wood, mixed with pitch obtained from gas tar, or with natural asphalt or bitumen, in the construction of roads, sidewalks, etc., shall indeed any description of workmen which asphalt is ordinarily employed, is claimed to be advantageous.

The Boy in the Alley.

Yesterday afternoon a brush-street housewife lugged a bedstead into the back-yard, leaned it against the fence, pulled up her sleeves, and went back and brought out a basketful of clothing but water. Her sole object was to wash off the dust and cobwebs which settle on every bedstead in the land, and she needn't have looked half around in a sly and stealthy way before proceeding to business.

There was a boy in the alley. He was hunting for plunder in a pile of rubbish, and, hearing the woman in the yard, he looked through the fence and began to chuckle. He knew that her object was to put the bedstead in tidy trim for the summer campaign, but yet he maliciously called out:

"Have the water up to the piano, pard! If you want to knock 'em!"

The woman put the basketful down in a hurry, and looked up at the wise man on either side. No one was visible, but presently the boy in the alley remarked:

"Don't let that water git cold!"

She located him that time, but she disdained to heed his remarks. Lifting up the kettle again, she began giving up the cobwebs another soaking.

"Now follow it up with kerosene!" hoarsely exclaimed the boy, as she paused for a moment.

Her face darkened, and she looked anxiously around, and nothing but the consciousness that everybody has a right to clean off the spring cobwebs prevented her from leaking mad.

"We allus use corrosive sublimate to kill 'em!" called the boy from the kindling-pile.

She went down to the fence and asked who was there, and what he wanted.

"I don't want nuthin'," he softly replied, "only you can't never kill 'em with hot water!"

"Can't kill what?" she sternly demanded.

"Bumble bees!" he chuckled. "We've had 'em up home ever since I was born."

"Boy, I'm only cleaning the dust off that bedstead," she said, as she got closer to the knot-hole.

"You kin call it that if ye want to, but I never saw no fun at dust with a shiny stick!"

"You are a mean, impudent boy, and I want you to go away from here at once," she exclaimed.

"This alley belongs to the city," he replied, "and I can't go. You'd better hurry back there, or they'll come in!"

She picked up a stick, laid it down after a moment, and going to the house, she brought out a huge piece of apple pie.

Saint-Saens.

A good story on Mons. Saint-Saens whose works are popular in Boston) is current. He is not only near-sighted, he is near-sightedness itself. He knocked a lady down, Cother day, by running against her, and gave her a kick when she was on the ground, saying, as he lifted his hoof: "You confounded old wheelbarrow, you came near making me fall!" Some time before this adventure, he stumbled over a barrel lying on the sidewalk, and jumped up for it said him low), took off his hat, and bowed as fast as he could, saying: "Ten thousand pardons, madam! I really did not see you." His latest adventure was at a party. He had at last consented to play, but the best had hard work to get him to the piano-stool. He was no sooner seated than he became all excitement. He, with one hand, threw his hair back, as it would alternately ing the flute, and lifted his head as if he tried to pierce the ceiling. "You have seen these frenzied musicians. He, for an hour, kept the company under the charm of his brilliant execution and extemporization; but, after an hour, attention began to stray. When sixty minutes of his music had been enjoyed, the company began to make French leave, exchanging, as they retreated, a guilty wink as each one of the host and hostess. Presently the hostess herself gave out and left the room. Mons. Saint-Saens was more brilliant than ever. His eyes shot flames; his body swayed to and fro; he beat time with his head. The clock struck two! a. m. The host, feeling drowsiness ... master him completely, went to Mons. Saint-Saens, and, laying his hand upon his musician's shoulder, asked: "My dear sir, now can I ever sufficiently express my gratitude for the delightful evening you have made all of us spend; but I am afraid you must be a little tired; aren't you?" Mons. Saint-Saens replied, without looking up or stopping his play. "Tired? No; am just beginning to get in the humor to play. To-night's speech by deed, Mons. Saint-Saens dashed off with a fire, vehemence, vigor, whose like he had never shown during the whole evening. The host dropped in. He joined his sleeping wife, and left drowsy servants to show the musician to the door at last he did creep in his performance. This was not till seven o'clock. Then Mons. Saint-Saens quitted the piano-stool, and, bowing very low to right and left as he retired (only always, he went home delighted with himself, for he thought even the absence of applause showed the company were enraptured beyond expression. He was far from imagining that the ladies and gentlemen to whom he had bowed so low, as he withdrew, were only in the halls and lounges.—Paris Cor. Boston Gazette.

"Boy, Aren't you hungry?" she asked, as she reached the fence.

"You bet!"

"And if I give you this will you go away?"

"I will that; I'll whoop right out of the neighborhood in two minutes, and you kin tack a shingle over this knot-hole."

"Well, now, here it is," she said as she reached it over.

"And I won't tell no one what I saw, ma'am, for we're all liable to find 'em, and ma says she really believes they're a sign of good luck. Thank'ee, and if I was you I'd leave the bedstead out-doors to-night and let 'em freeze up. Fust-rate pie, and don't let that water git cold!"—Detroit Free Press.

The Terrors of House-Cleaning Disarmed.

House-cleaning, that hideous bugbear that annually rises like a grim spectre before the vision of many a perplexed and troubled matron, is really a pleasure if well managed, methodically planned and rightly carried out.

All housewives do not consider the annual living—there are those who really enjoy the yearly renovating of the home nest. "I am in my element," when in the midst of our regular spring house-cleaning," I hear a most efficient lady remark not long ago.

Think well over all that has to be done, lay the plans systematically and carefully, and in the fine, mild spring days commence—not with a rush, to be soon wearied and worn and discouraged, but one thing at a time. In no business does this old adage apply so well as in this, one thing at a time.

Don't upset the entire house at once, and make the husband and children all homeless—sick of home—but work at it so quietly, room by room, that you will hardly be suspected. Have an assault by a general confusion. It is annoying to see how some people go about this work, house in a disorder for over, no alpha or omega anywhere, but general mayhem, with ludicrous delay and worriment. Filling rooms and furniture "to rights." How they are always "to rights" and taken on as we have described. The Pullman Hotel car the case is different in every respect. Its journey is only to sixty-six feet long, have sixteen wheels and is built entirely, so as to insure steady, quiet running, with as little motion as possible. Each Hotel car contains, in addition to the regular number of seats, one compartment for ladies, one for gentlemen, a baggage-room, a linen-room, a kitchen, a pantry, and a dining-room. This is fitted up with the greatest care and neatness, and is capable of seating forty persons. The dining-room is finished in hard wood, and is furnished with chairs, tables, etc. The kitchen is supplied with every convenience for cooking, and is in charge of a skilful cook. The pantry is filled with a choice assortment of canned meats, fruits, pickles, etc. The linen-room contains a full supply of table linen, towels, napkins, etc. The baggage-room is in charge of a baggage-master, who has charge of the baggage of passengers using the car

The New York Herald has a cable telegram from St. Petersburg, Russia, which says Russia has 500,000 men on the Danube, and 125,000 men in the Caucasus, while in the opposing forces of the Turks are 100,000 along the Danube and 50,000 or less in Asia Minor.

England has taken a precipitation of neutrality on the Eastern question, but the greatest activity prevails in all her navy yards, and her army is being pushed on a war footing. She is massing 50,000 troops in Egypt, from whence point they may be moved speedily, should they be needed.

The Canucks want Victoria declared Empress of Canada on the butterfly anniversary of her coronation, June 20. She is now Empress of India. Australia is a more important part of the United Kingdom than the New Dominion, and has the stronger imperial claim of the two. Besides, Canada will have part of the United States one of these days.

Sometimes words are necessary of the Navy Thompson ordered Rear Admiral Worden, commanding the U. S. fleet in European waters, to proceed with his force to the Bosphorus, and watch carefully over American interests in the Mediterranean during the war. In pursuance of this he has squadrons of six vessels of war, carrying 70 guns and 1,042 men, besides officers.

The Democrats are now amazed at the fact that Gen. Grant is not rich. Their organs have been calling him a thief for these eight years past, and it is so contrary to Democratic precedent for one in office to refrain from stealing, that nearly half the members of that party thought the accusation was true. Hence their surprise upon learning that Gen. Grant has not stolen himself rich.

Father Joos has been called to Detroit from Mackinac, to assume and perform the duties of Bishop Rargess during the latter's absence at the Pope's jubilee. Rev. Father Zhos, of Monroe, has also been called to Detroit to perform the duties of the Bishop's secretary during the same time. Rev. Frank O'Brien (who was ordained a short time since) will succeed Father Joos as pastor of St. John's Church in Monroe during the latter's absence.

—The officers of the Bay View Camp Ground Association, at Petoskey, have issued a circular to the members of that body set forth some of the attractions of that locality as a place to spend a camp meeting, especially to those troubled with asthma, hay fever, catarrhal affections etc. and where those who wish to hunt, fish, row, sail, and recreate generally. The circular mentions the railway and water routes by which the grounds can be reached, and on the reverse side of the document is a map which gives the location of Petoskey and all the railway system of the State which has any relation to it.

The famous divorce suit of Ann Eliza Cunningham Young, the Mormon prophet, was decided by the district court in Utah last Friday. The court decided that Brigham had been legally married but once, and that all his subsequent weddings were null and void. Also, Eliza's being one of the latter, there were no legal matrimonial bonds to sever in her case, and the suit was dismissed. The court also decided that while she was living with him as a wife she was really only a servant, and was entitled to compensation as such; but she already received such compensation in the way of temporary alimony heretofore granted, and there was nothing more for the court to do in the premises.

The United States navy now consists of 146 vessels, 176,157 tons measurement. Exclusive of howitzers and Gatlings they carry 1,142 guns of these 153, carrying 853 guns, will be a measurement of 150,941 tons, have steam power and 29, carrying nominally 209 guns, with a measurement of 29,269 tons, are sailing vessels.

Of the whole number of vessels, 62 are at present in actual use, thirty-seven are attached to fleets, two are in use as training ships, six on special service and as dispatch and freight ships, two are torpedo boats, five are receiving ships, two are store ships, two more are used by States, under act of Congress, as school-ships, and nineteen are in use as quarters, gunnery ships, tenders, etc., at the navy yards and shore stations. Of the remainder, nine are repairing and almost ready for sea, eight are under repairs, and fifty-nine are laid up at the various navy yards.

It is strange, but true, nevertheless, that the Upper Peninsula is to-day the great agricultural rival of Michigan and Minnesota, for all the produce it contributes.

The indications are that Roumania will join with Russia in the war against the Turks. She will be a valuable ally, for her army number 95,000 men, which may be increased to 150,000 by calling out her militia, or reserve forces.

False Impression.

It is generally supposed by a certain class of citizens, who are not practical or experienced men, that carpenters and mechanics in general, can go at a moment's notice and become a Money Making Insurance Agent, or Sewing Machine Peddler, and be successful. Every Carpenter and Joiner Competent in every respect to Build, Alter or Repair Dwellings, Stores, Churches, Shops, Barns, etc., can get Steady employment at Good Wages, and in addition at the Leisure hours, can, and last year, did a single Mechanic make, retail, into Cash Orders, from Steady Customers, Commercial Orders. These Orders will be very easy for Any Carpenter or Mechanic to secure while she was living with him as a wife she was really only a servant, and was entitled to compensation as such; but she already received such compensation in the way of temporary alimony heretofore granted, and there was nothing more for the court to do in the premises.

The institution is called Purple Hill I. O. L. No. 144, and meets every Monday on or before the full moon.

From the late report of Chief Engineer Kline, of the U. S. Navy, on Russian ships of war, we learn that the Turkish navy is as much superior to that of Russia, as the military power of the latter exceeds that of the former. The Russian navy comprises 29 armored vessels, and 196 of all other classes, carrying in all but 561 guns and less than 9,000 men. The Turkish navy consists of 90 men-of-war, of which 26 are powerful iron clads, as good as any afloat anywhere, and they carry a fighting force of 34,000 men. Turkey has spent fifteen million dollars on her navy in the last five years.

EASTWARD.

A Cruise Among the Farms and Villages.

We were gloriously happy in being able to lay aside the vexations of editorial and other duties and caper into the woods and suburban villages, but we were happier after getting there to find everybody else happy in the possession of a country fit for a King to live in, if natural beauty and fertility go to make up a royal realm. Desiring to reach the farthest point first and work homeward, we took the road for Boyne Falls, and under the over-arching trees we marched onward until thirst compelled us to turn in at the farm of Mr. H. Wright. Besides noticing a very pretty place, we found here one of the best laid out and finest flower-yard we have seen in many years. It was verily cheering.

BOYNE FALLS,

The only railroad settlement in the county, is by virtue of location, and the possession of an enterprising proprietor destined to be come a lively little business mart. Mr. Powers is doing much to beautify the plat, and if money and energy can make a beautiful village, the destiny of Boyne Falls is apparent. They have a hotel and three stores—A. O. Carpenter, W. A. Nelson, and the furniture store of W. H. Barnes. Mr. Powers has a good saw mill on the Boyne river, which supplies the home market and furnishes a handsome surplus for shipment. We returned the same day to the

HEAD OF PINE LAKE.

The ambition of the village-builders of this point seems divided between the mouth of the Boyne and the point opposite known as Spring Harbor. Both have natural advantages but both can't make large cities. At the mouth of the Boyne they have three stores, a blacksmith shop and shoe shop. Mr. Porter has commenced the erection of a cosy little residence, having sold his present one to Mr. Charles Miller, who will convert it into a hotel. As at the other points we have mentioned, a considerable quantity of wood and bark is handled here. Mr. Porter has been perseverling, public spirited and enterprising, and is reaping his reward.

OTHER MATTERS.

We were fortunate in being able to visit the farm of Mr. Vogel, about a half mile from the head of Pine Lake. Mr. Vogel possesses a very fine place and most excellently located. Mr. Vogel is a savant in the culture of bees, having followed that business quite extensively in Switzerland. He has lately been unfortunate with his bees, but starts out again with a firm confidence in his ultimate success. We think Evangeline very fortunate in possessing a family of the intellectual and industrial qualities of the Vogels. We extend thanks for courtesies shown us by Messrs Powers, Beardsley and Porter.

THE JENNIE SUTTON.

The obliging conduct of Capt. Aldrich, and the speed, safety and regularity of the Sutton, gives the Pine Lake people advantages of travel and communication of which they should be gratefully proud. She is always to be relied upon and her excellent management renders it not a task but really a pleasure to travel by her.

THE TRIP

We came home grateful that our lot has been cast "in pleasant places" and "beside the still waters." We are better satisfied than ever with our county, and more than ever convinced of its future importance as an agricultural region. Evidences are ample of the rising condition of the people, and a growing disposition among them of fixed and settled purposes.

THE DICTIONARY AS AN INSTRUCTOR.

We notice as a matter well worth mentioning, that at the recent great publishers' trade sale in New York, the books that were most in demand and brought the best prices were Webster's Dictionaries, from the famous Quarto to the neat and handy pocket edition. This fact is a good indication of the almost universal popularity of these books, and of the growing public demand of them. It indicates also a fact of far greater importance, and that is the interest the people are taking in the study of their own language. This is encouraging, as there is no branch of education that is new and has been so much neglected as the common branches of spelling and defining. It is often astonishing and grievous to see how grossly ignorant are our children and youth, and even men and women, of the orthography, pronunciation and meaning of ordinary words phrases. They cannot express their thoughts for the want of words, and often they express thoughts very different from what they intend, because they do not understand the words they employ. And very frequently, from the same cause, they take no idea, or wrong ideas, from what they read or hear.

The remedy for these evils is the proper training in the study of words, by the use of the Dictionary, and this training should begin as soon as the child can distinguish between one word and another, and continue indefinitely. The apparatus for this study should, of course, be the most complete and thorough to be had, and this is abundantly supplied in Webster's Dictionaries, which are justly recognized, wherever our language is spoken, as the standard authority in English. Parents and teachers can in no other way so effectually or so cheaply promote the educational interests of their children, when of suitable age, as by putting in their hands any one of Webster's School Dictionaries, for daily use in connection with the study of their lessons, and by placing on the family center table, or the teacher's desk as the authoritative guide and standard, a copy of the Unabridged.

The unbridged contains 3,000 illustrations, over 114,000 words in its vocabularies, and 10,000 words and meanings not in any other Dictionary; the abridged editions comprise "The Primary," which has the largest sale, and which has some capital rules for spelling. "The Common School" is similar, but larger, with tables of synonyms, &c. "The High School," still fuller, with many useful tables; "The Academic" and "Counting-house" for advanced schools and for general house and business use. The latter has some specially valuable commercial and financial tables. The little "Pocket" edition, with its bright gilt edges and morocco binding, is truly an invaluable pocket companion. It contains more than 18,000 words, rules for spelling, many abbreviations, words and phrases, proverbs, etc., ordinarily met with in the Greek, Latin and Modern languages. Whether it is convenient or not to have copies of any of the other books of the series, we certainly recommend that all should possess a copy of the Pocket, which, when not otherwise obtainable, may be had by mail, by inclosing $ 1 to the publishers, Messrs. Ivison, Blakeman, Taylor & Co., 138 and 140 Grand Street, New York.

New goods! new goods! Piles of them, just received at Carpenter & Bartholomew's.

M. de Lesseps, who constructed the Suez Canal, has another big project in view—at least he actively suggests one of the grandest undertakings ever yet proposed by man. He would simply cut a ditch from the ocean waters into the great Desert of Sahara, and flood that entire region, some three or four million square miles, which is said to be eighty feet below the level of the sea.

It is a late hour in the day to question the title of President Hayes, as some disreputable Democratic journals persist in doing. The Electoral Law, through the operation of which Rutherford B. Hayes was declared elected President of the United States, was a measure devised and supported, largely, by the ablest Democratic statesmen in the country. There was a distinct understanding that the arbitrations to be made under the law should be final, and be accepted by all parties. For the Democrats to talk about "fraudulency" now, is simply contemptible nonsense.

The New York Herald has a correspondent from St. Petersburg, Russia, which says Russia has 200,000 men on the Danube, and 125,000 men in the Caucasus, while in the opposing forces of the Turks are 140,000 along the Danube, and 50,000 or less in Asia Minor.

England has issued a proclamation of neutrality on the Eastern question, but the government privately permits all her navy yards, and her army is being put on a war footing. She is massing 50,000 troops in Egypt, from which point they may be moved speedily, should they be needed.

The Canucks want Victoria declared Empress of Canada on the fortieth anniversary of her coronation, June 20. She is now Empress of India. Australia is a more important part of the United Kingdom than the New Dominion, and has the stronger imperial claim of the two. Besides, Canada will lose part of the United States one of these days.

Some three weeks ago, Secretary of the Navy Thompson ordered Rear Admiral Worden, commanding the U. S. fleet in European waters, to proceed with his force to the Bosphorus, and watch carefully over American interests on the Turkish coast. The fleet now in progress. Its fleet consists of six vessels of war, carrying 59 guns and 1,042 men, besides officers.

The Democrats are now amused at the fact that Gen. Grant is not rich. Their organs have been calling him a thief for these eight years past, and it is so contrary to Democratic precedent for one in office to refrain from stealing, that nearly half the members of that party thought the accusation was true. Hence their surprise upon learning that Gen. Grant has not stolen himself rich.

Father Jouvhes has been called to Detroit from Mt. Carmel, and will perform the duties of Bishop Borgess during a six months' absence of the Bishop at Rome. Rev. Father Mace, of Monroe, has also been called to Detroit to perform the duties of the Bishop's secretary during the same time. Rev. Frank Gleeve (who was ordained a short time since) will serve as pastor of St. John's Church in Monroe, during these six months.

—The officers of the Bay View Camp Ground Association, at Petoskey, have issued a statement to the public, in which they set forth some of the attractions of that locality as a pleasant summer resort, especially to those troubled with asthma, hay fever, catarrhal affections etc., and also to those who wish to have fine, cool, and recruit generally. The circular insists on the railway and water routes by which the grounds can be reached, and on the reverse side of the document is a map which gives the location of Petoskey and all the railway stations of the State which use any station at all.

The famous divorce suit of Ann Eliza vs. Brigham Young, the Mormon prophet, was decided by the highest court in Utah last Friday. The court decided that Brigham had been legally married but once and that the 27 subsequent weddings were null and void. Ann Eliza's being one of the latter, there were no legal matrimonial clouds to sever in her case, and the suit was dismissed. The court also decided that while she was living with him as a wife she was legally only a servant, and was entitled to compensation accordingly, that she already received such compensation in the way of temporary alimony heretofore granted, and there was nothing more for the court to do in the premises.

The United States navy now consists of 148 vessels, 138,137 tons measurement. Exclusive of launches and tenders they carry 1,142 guns of these 123, carrying 813 guns, with a measurement of 120,891 tons, have steam power and 20, carrying nominally 329 guns, with a measurement of 19,246 tons, are sailing vessels.

Of the whole number of vessels, 76 are at present in actual use, thirty-seven are attached to fleets, two are in use as training ships, six on special service and six dispatch and freight ships, two are torpedo boats, five are receiving ships two are store ships, two more are used by States, under act of Congress, as school ships, and nineteen are in use as quarters, summer ships, tenders, etc., at the navy yards and shore stations. Of the remainder, four are preparing and almost ready for sea, eight are under repairs, and fifty-nine are laid up at the various navy yards.

HEAD OF PINE LAKE.

The ambition of the village-builders of this point seems divided between the mouth of the Boyne and the point opposite known as Spring Harbor. Both have natural advantages but both can't make large cities. At the mouth of the Boyne they have three stores, a kind of a hotel, and several residences. The stores are kept by A. J. Beardsley & Co. C. C. Batchelor, and J. H. Thompson. There are unmistakable evidences of a promising future for Boyne.

SPRING HARBOR

Boasts of one store and one dwelling Mr. F. M. Abraham, the only dealer has commenced the erection of a residence We were the guest of "Uncle John" and "Aunt Harriet" Miller on Wednesday night, and right royally we were entertained. May the good old couple live yet many years.

ADVANCE.

Formerly known as "Porter's Mill" certainly takes the lead of all other Pine Lake points. The grist and saw mill of W. H. Porter make it a desirable place for farmers to trade and is conveniently accessable to a large tract of country. They have a store under the proprietorship of A. E. Hayes, and we understood there was another store somewhere in town. They have also a blacksmith shop and shoe shop. Mr. Porter has commenced the erection of a cosy little residence, having sold his present one to Mr. Charles Hiller, who will convert it into a hotel As at the other points we have mentioned, a considerable quantity of wood and bark is handled here. Mr. Porter has been perseverING, public spirited and enterprising, and is reaping his reward.

OTHER MATTERS.

We were fortunate in being able to visit the farm of Mr. Vogel, about a half mile from the head of Pine Lake. Mr. Vogel possesses a very fine place and most excellently located. Mr. Vogel is a savant in the culture of bees, having followed that business quite extensively in Switzerland. He has lately been unfortunate with his bees, but starts out again with a firm confidence in his ultimate success. We think Evangeline very fortunate in possessing a family of the intellectual and industrial qualities of the Vogels. We extend thanks for courtesies shown us by Messrs Powers, Beardsley and Porter.

THE JENNIE SUTTON.

The obliging conduct of Capt. Aldrich, and the speed, safety and regularity of the Sutton, gives the Pine Lake people advantages of travel and communication of which they should be grateful proud. She is always to be relied upon and her excellent management renders it not a task but really a pleasure to travel by her.

THE TRIP

We came home grateful that our lot has been cast "in pleasant places" and "beside the still waters." We are better satisfied than ever with our county, and more than ever convinced of its future importance as an agricultural region. Evidences are ample of the rising condition of the people, and a growing disposition among them of fixed and settled purposes.

THE DICTIONARY AS AN INSTRUCTOR.

We notice as a matter well worth mentioning, that at the recent great publishers' trade sale in New York, the books that were most in demand and brought the best prices were Webster's Dictionaries, from the famous Quarto to the neat and handy pocket edition. This fact is a good indication of the almost universal popularity of those books, and of the growing public demand of them. It indicates also a fact of far greater importance, and that is the interest the people are taking in the step of their own language. This is encouraging, as there is no branch of education that is new and has been so much neglected as the common branches of spelling and defining. It is often astonishing and grievous to see how grossly ignorant are the children and youth, and even men and women, of the orthography, pronunciation and meaning of ordinary words in daily use. They cannot express their thoughts for the want of words, and often they express thoughts very different from what they intend, because they do not understand the words they employ. And very frequently, from the same cause, they take no idea, or wrong ideas, from what they read or hear.

The remedy for these evils is the proper training in the study of words, by the use of the Dictionary, and this training should begin as soon as the child can distinguish between one word and another, and continue indefinitely. The apparatus for this study should, of course, be the most complete and thorough to be had, and this is abundantly supplied in Webster's Dictionaries, which are justly recognized, wherever our language is spoken, as the standard authority in English. Parents and teachers can in no other way so effectually or so cheaply promote the educational interests of their children, whom of suitable age, as by putting in their hands any one of Webster's School Dictionaries, for daily use in connection with the study of their lessons, and by placing on the family or teacher's table, or the teacher's desk as the authoritative guide and standard, a copy of the Unabridged.

The unbridged contains 9,000 illustrations, over 114,000 words and meanings not to any other Dictionary; the abridged editions comprise "The Primary," which has the largest sale, and which has some capital rules for spelling. "The Common School" is similar, but larger, with tables of synonyms, etc. "The High School," still fuller, with many useful tables; "The Academic" and "Counting-house" for advanced schools and for general house and business use. The latter has some specially valuable commercial and financial notices. The little "Pocket" edition, with its bright gilt edges and morocco binding, is truly an invaluable pocket companion. It contains more than 18,000 words, rules for spelling, many abbreviations, words and phrases, proverbs, etc., ordinarily met with in the Greek, Latin and Modern languages. Whether it is convenient or not to have copies of any of the other books of the series, we certainly recommend that all should possess a copy of the Pocket, which, when not otherwise obtainable, may be had by mail, by inclosing $1.00 to the publishers, Messrs. Ivison, Blakeman, Taylor & Co., 138 and 140 Grand Street, New York.

New goods! new goods! Piles of them, just received at Carpenter & Bartholomew's.

M. de Lesseps, who constructed the Suez Canal, has another big project in its views—at least he seriously suggests one of the grandest undertakings ever yet proposed by man. He would simply cut a ditch from the ocean waters into the great Desert of Sahara, and flood that entire region, some three or four million square miles, which is said to be eighty feet below the level of the sea.

It is a late hour in the day to question the title of President Hayes, as some disreputable Democratic journals persist in doing. The Electoral Law, through the operation of which Rutherford B Hayes was declared elected President of the United States, was a measure devised and supported, largely, by the ablest Democratic statesmen in the country. There was a distinct understanding that the selections to be made under the law should be final, and he accepted by all parties. For the Democrats to talk about "fraudulent," now, is simply contemptible nonsence.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

FOREIGN.

THE Porte has declined to recognize the arrangement by which Russian subjects in Turkey were placed under the protection of Germany, and the German Government has entered a vigorous protest.

ON the 29th, the Roumanian Minister of Foreign Affairs notified the Chamber of Deputies that he had signed a convention with Russia, by virtue of which the latter was promised free passage across the country and the treatment due to a friendly Nation. The Czar, on his part, had bound himself to respect the rights of Roumania as secured by the Treaty of 1856. No convention had been signed with the Porte, because it had persisted in making Roumania the theater of war, and had refused to recognize the country or settle long-pending difficulties.

THE Novelty Works building in Montreal, Can., was burned on the morning of the 29th ult., and nine persons were crushed or burned to death, and several others were injured —mostly firemen.

Chisholm and son were arrested and imprisoned in De Kalb, Miss. Chisholm and daughter insisted on sharing their confinement. On Sunday, the 29th, Chisholm sent to Scooba for chloroform, for whom a warrant had been issued. Gilmer came and on his arrival was arrested; but just as he arrived at the jail was set upon by a mob and killed. The jailer was then overpowered by the mob, who immediately attacked Chisholm, mortally wounding him and killing his son. Miss Chisholm, in defending her father, shot and killed Dr. Hosier, and Mrs. Chisholm severely wounded young Daily, a son of Daily who was assassinated. Miss Chisholm was also seriously wounded. Incendiarism and disguises were current in the week in the mob, in cases from them the whereabouts of Rush, the alleged assassin of Daily. It is supposed Beeckham and Hopper will escape. It is reported that a horrible state of affairs is existing throughout that section. The people are wild with excitement, and other hangings will probably follow."

IN the divorce case of ANN ELIZA vs. Brigham Young, Judge Schaeffer has decided that there was no marriage between the parties, and that hence the plaintiff is not entitled to a decree of divorce. The Judge also decides that, for the mental sorrow which she endured since the Prophet during the years of their joint polygamous career, as man and wife de facto, she would be entitled to recover a reasonable compensation; but, as she has already received is the form of alimony during the pendency of the litigation, a sum in excess of the value of her services as shown in the proof, she has exhausted her legal claim upon Brigham's estate, and must look to the law for no further consideration.

THE verdict of the Coroner's jury in the case of the Southern Hotel fire in St. Louis is to the effect that the fire had its origin in the basement of the hotel, in their opinion the store-room, but possibly the wine cellar, but, in either case, near the bottom of the burning elevator, which carried the flames and heat almost instantly to the upper floors and roof of the building. The bones of the building are consumed, among other things, for lasting made on partition for using the necessary means at hand for extinguishing a fire; for carelessness in storing inflammable materials in the storeroom or cellar, and for making an insufficient effort on the night of the fire to awaken their guests and employes.

AN Omaha telegram of the 27th says a heavy snow-storm, reported in the mountains on the night of the 25th, had passed over the entire line of the Union Pacific Road reaching that city in the shape of a severe rain storm. At Laramie Junction it was snowing hard. The thermometer ranged remarkably low for the season. The wool-growing interests were unfledged in that this cold storm would have the effect entirely to destroy the grasshoppers.

Cameron in Africa.

In a notice of Commander Cameron's recent publication, "Across Africa," the New York Evening Post says:

Commander Cameron suffered much, as all Central African travelers do, with the malarious fevers of that country, and the following description of the sensations experienced in an attack of the sort indicates the distressing nature of the disease.

"One night I thought I was at least twenty people, all of whom were in pain, and that each one had the same feeling as all the rest. Another night the fancies were more distinct, and I experienced a complete sense of duality. I imagined that another person, a second self, was lying upon the opposite side of the boat, and I was perfectly conscious of every shake of ague and pang of headache that he suffered. I thought, too, that the teapot of cold tea which had been placed on that side of the boat was for his sole benefit, and when, in my tossing about, I rolled over to that side, I seized the teapot and drank like a whale, and chuckled at the idea of the other thirsty mortal having been done out of some of his tipple."

Fever was not by any means the only, perhaps it was not even the greatest, hindrance to the traveler's work. His porters and carriers were constantly stoning merchandize, which was his money; they got drunk at inconvenient times, deserted at critical moments, outraged the natives and created hostility; they would refuse to move, too, when he was ready to march, and the man whom he had employed to command them, constantly absented them in their evil practices. Another serious obstacle was the irregularity concerning customs dues, which were exacted in every Chief's territory. It was frequently necessary to wait a day or two for a drunken chief to get sober before a parley on this subject could be begun, and then another day or two would be consumed in a dispute as to the amount to be paid.

The natives were sometimes friendly, and sometimes the reverse, but whether friendly or hostile they managed always to be extremely disagreeable. Their habit of anointing themselves with rancid castor oil, and their negative habit of not washing themselves, made them unpleasant visitors, and they were as persistent as they were disagreeable guests. Of one of his visitors Mr. Cameron writes:

"He seemed half-witted, and certainly was the coolest fellow I ever met; for he did not hesitate to take the pipe out of my mouth, and, after a whiff or two, to pass it on to a circle of greasy, dirty natives, who were squatting round us, staring as only a negro can stare."

Another of the traveler's annoyances was that he was constantly examined and exhibited as a curiosity. Writing of one of his visitors he says:

"He recognized some pictures of animals which we showed him, but invariably looked at the back of the paper to see what was there, and remarked that he did not consider them finished, since they did not give the likeness of the other side of the animal."

This exacting art critic was pleased, however, with his entertainment, and he resolved to detain the travelers for several days, so that the people who had never seen a white man, might examine them and their effects.

Com. Cameron was not less a sightseer than his entertainers were, although he was more cautious than they, and he has put upon record many observations of their customs which are of interest to engineers in making study of African civilization:

"There are two of these public houses—or, perhaps, they may be more properly termed 'clubs'—in nearly every village in Unyamwesi, one for each sex. That appropriated to the women is not open to strangers; but at the one frequented by the men all travelers of distinction are welcomed by the Chiefs and elders."

Youths become club-men rather early in African it appears:

"As soon as a boy attains the age of seven or eight years he throws off the authority of his mother and passes most of his time at the club, usually eating and often sleeping there."

Luxury and richness of apparel are sought as Africa as elsewhere, but in crude ways chiefly. A King who was making a royal progress through his dominions called upon the traveler on one occasion:

"He was dressed in a scarlet burnoose trimmed with gold and embroidery, which looked rather odd over his greasy waistcloth, his only other garment."

At Ujiaga Mr. Cameron was visited by a head man, whom he describes as a very civil young man of five-and-twenty years of age:

"When he called on me I was lying on my bed, without boots or stockings, waiting for my bath. I showed him my guns, books and other curiosities to occupy his attention; but in the midst of his examination of these things he suddenly caught sight of my toes and looked at them most carefully, remarking that my feet were much too white and soft for walking. Thus he transferred his attention to my hands, which certainly could not be called white, having been tanned to the color of a dirty dogskin glove; but after inspection he arrived at the conclusion that, had some very little work, and therefore must be an important personage in my own country."

The modes of salutation in the neighborhood of Ugaga are very curious:

"When two grandees meet, the junior leans forward, bends his knees and places the palms of his hands on the ground on each side of his feet, while the senior claps his hands six or seven times. They then change round, and the junior slaps himself first under the left armpit and then under the right. But when a 'swell' meets an inferior, the superior only claps his hands and does not fully return the salutation by following the motions of the one who first salutes. In two communes meeting they rest their stomachs, then clap hands at each other, and finally shake hands. These greetings are observed to an unlimited extent, and the sound of patting and clapping is almost unceasing."

The custom of "making brothers," or fraternizing, which is common in Central Africa, interested Commander Cameron, not merely because of the odd ceremonies with which the brother-making is accomplished, but because he believes that the custom is of Semitic origin, and that it was introduced into Africa by heathen Arabs before the time of Mohammed. The traveller was present at the brother-making between Syde, one of his following, and a Chief, Pakwanywa, and he thus describes the ceremony:

"The first operation consisted of making an incision on each of their wrists, just sufficient to draw blood, a little of which was scraped off and smeared on the other's cut, after which gunpowder was rubbed in. The concluding part of the ceremony was performed by Pakwanywa's sponsor holding a sword resting on his (Pakwanywa's) shoulder, while he witnessed for Syde went through the motions of sharpening a knife on it. Both sponsors then alternately made a speech, calling down imprecations on Pakwanywa and all his relations, past, present and future, and praying that their graves might be defiled by pigs if he broke the brotherhood in word, thought or deed. The same form having been gone through with respect to Syde, the sponsors changing duties, the brother-making was complete."

Crushed in the Dark.

One of the most heart-rending accidents which has been recorded for some time has just occurred at the Empire mine, near Scranton, Pa. Two men, named John Mooney and Patrick Quinn, were employed in No. 4. slope, laying track, a distance of about two miles from the opening, and a mile from the other workmen. When they least dreamed of danger there was a sudden convulsion overhead, and an instant later they were overwhelmed by a fearful fall of rock. The terrible accident put out their lights, and there was utter darkness. Mooney, after considerable difficulty, succeeded in extricating himself from among the massive bowlders, which fell about him in such a way as to form a sort of cave, and upon freeing himself his first thought was for his companion. He called aloud for Quinn, but received no answer—only the echo of his own voice beating back by the rocks. He felt himself growing faint, and realized that he was seriously injured, but was determined to ascertain the condition of his fellow-miner. After calling aloud in vain for some time, he groped about in the dismal place among the rocks, hoping to find Quinn and learning that he was dead.

At length he succeeded in finding him, but the poor fellow was pinned fast by a big bowlder which lay upon one of his mangled legs. The other leg had been completely severed from the body by the fall. To release him was a hard task, but Mooney, forgetting his own injuries, set about the work with a will and succeeded in getting Quinn free.

How to carry him to the light of day was the next trial, but he was determined to do it, and, taking him upon his back, he began groping his way through the pitchy darkness in the direction of what he considered was the foot of the slope. For two hours he wandered about the living tomb, with his dying comrade on his back moaning in the most piteous manner. The situation was awful, and, after running thus for a long time, poor Mooney was disheartened to find that he had come back to the very point from which he had set out, and where the accident occurred. He summoned up his fast-failing strength and made another effort, still taking Quinn on his back, but, after proceeding a short distance, he grew faint, and was unable to go further with his precious burden. Then, laying the dying man down in as comfortable a position as he could, Mooney crawled on his hands and knees toward what he thought was the slope. At half-past six o'clock a party of miners, while proceeding down No. 6 slope, were startled by the apparition of their lamps revealed. It was Mooney crawling slowly up the slope on his hands and knees, his face black and bloody, and his whole body soiled from contact with the jagged pieces of coal and rock. His eyes were at first dazzled by the light; he had been in darkness so long and trying to see, and he was speechless with joy for some seconds to find relief—at last.

This was eight hours after the accident had happened, and they were eight hours of awful mortal agony. As soon as Mooney found words to speak he related the story in brief, and begged the party to haste: to the assistance of Quinn, who might yet be saved.

They hurried to the spot indicated and found the unfortunate fellow in the condition already described, with one leg severed from his body and the other crushed to pieces. He was still alive and they took him up in their arms to carry him to the slope, but he never reached it alive. He died in the arms of his comrades. Mooney, who is severely wounded, is expected to recover. He played the part of a hero in the unselfish manner in which he risked his own life trying to save his comrade.—New York Herald.

Harriet Martineau's First Literary Venture.

It was at the age of nineteen that Harriet Martineau felt the sensation, that is so delightful to most authors, of seeing her first contribution to literature in print. The account of her entrance upon the vocation of an authoress is full of interest. For some years, it seems, she had aspired to this vocation. It happened that her brother James, who was going to leave home for college, perceiving that she was far from happy, advised her to turn her attention to literary pursuit which would distract and engage her mind, and suggested writing for the press. The very next morning, before six o'clock, she was at her desk composing an article on "Female Writers on Practical Divinity"—a ponderous theme for a girl of nineteen, which, it is when finished, she sent to a small Unitarian periodical called the Monthly Repository. Keeping her design a secret from the family, she carried the article to the Postoffice, and awaited with palpitating heart the arrival of the next number of the Repository, it came just before service on Sunday morning; and when she turned the sheet her heart "thumped prodigiously" on seeing her article on the page. In the evening her elder brother, by chance, read the article aloud in his family circle, where Harriet was taking tea, praising it as he read. When he had ended it, he turned to her and said:

"Harriet, what is the matter with you? I never knew you so slow to praise anything before."

"I replied, in utter confusion:

"I never could bathe anybody. The truth is, that paper is mine."

"He made no reply, read on in silence, and spoke no more till I was on my feet to come away. He then laid his hand on my shoulder, and said, gravely:

"'Now, dear, leave it to other women to make shirts and darn stockings; and do you devote yourself to this.'

"'I even home,' she adds, "in a sort of dream, so that the squares of the pavement danced before my eyes. That evening made me an authoress."—Appleton's Journal.

The Oriental Business.

A good citizen of Croghan street was reading the other day of a Persian gentleman who always walked about with a smile on his face. When this Persian was asked why he always looked so happy with a other men looked sad, he replied:

A smile because it may be sunshine in some past soul surrounded by shadows."

It was very nice in the Persian, and the Croghanstreet man said he'd be hanged if he couldn't commence Persian or any body else walking around on two logs. He at once began to smile at his wife. She stood it for a few minutes, and then observed:

"What's the matter, William—got the colic again?"

"I smile because I want to carry sunshine to your darkened soul," he replied.

She wanted him to understand that fifteen minutes at the woodpile would help her more than all the grins he could grin in a straight week, and when he went into the kitchen to smile some sunshine at the hired girl the wife followed him and raised a row that put dinner thirty-quarters of an hour behindhand. However, one can't get the tang of Oriental business in a day, and this man tried it again on the street-car as he came down town yesterday. Opposite him sat an old woman with a basket, and from habit he commenced to smile the shadows from her heart. She watched him for two or three minutes, growing mad all the time, and presently she asked:

"Do you think you know me, that you are grinning across the aisle like a circus baboon?"

"I smile, madam, because—because—" he stammered, forgetting what the Persian said. "I smile, because I—"

"You are grinning because I've got sore eyes!" she shouted.

"No, madam. I smile that I—that I—"

"I'll not stand it!" she exclaimed, and she humped him with the basket until he escaped off the platform.

"Now, girl over that, will you?" she called after him as she shook the basket in the air.

The Persian who went around smiling was a fool, and I'm his first cousin!" growled the man, and he quit smiling, and picked a sight with a harness-maker.—Detroit Free Press.

A late medical report declares that a large majority of the pupils in the Cincinnati public schools are breathing an atmosphere containing more than one-tenth per cent. of carbonic acid.

MECHANICAL AND SCIENTIFIC.

—According to the researches of an eminent German naturalist, our earth has at one time or other been inhabited by 155,000 kinds of animals, of which 20,000 are now extinct, while the other 135,000 are still with us. Among the survivors are 2,000 varieties of mammalia, 2,000 of birds, 1,500 creeping things, 8,000 of fish, 100,000 of insects, 4,000 radiata, 3,500 polypyfera and 1,400 infusoria.

—West Virginia has the largest and most valuable body of timber of any State in the Union. Prof. Fontaine estimates that the area still covered by forests is between 10,000,000 and 10,000,000 acres, and that the value of the surplus exportable timber is fully $75,000,000 as it stands in the forests. The oak, walnut, cherry, ash, poplar, maple, elm, sycamore and locust attain a size rarely met and surpassed on the American Continent.

—An improved nozzle for fire-engines is described in the foreign journals, the peculiar feature of the device giving it some important advantages over others. This device consists of a pet formed to deliver a solid stream of water first, when it is desirable that the water should be spread, a slight turn of the wrist causes a number of small fingers to enter the stream and break it up into a number of fountain streams, which may be further subdivided by similar fingers alongside the jet until it falls in a fine spray. It is claimed for this spreading of the jet that the water not only acts more efficiently on the fire, but that the spray, by driving back the smoke and placing a shield of water between the fireman and the flames, enables him to get sufficiently near to pour water on the seat of the fire.

—A proposal to reduce the week from seven days to five, and, further, to rename the days, comes from Australia. Mr. H. K. Rusden, the author of this scheme, enunciates his view in a paper on the week in the last volume of the "Transactions of the Royal Society of Victoria," where he expresses the opinion that while reducing the number of the days in the week it would be a good opportunity to discard the present pagan names, and to substitute Onesday, Twosday, Threeday and Foursday for those of Sunday to be called Goodday. The author is very sanguine as to the success of his proposal, and answers the objection of impracticability with the remark that "the week itself was actually forced by the Romans, Greeks and many other peoples; and in fact as there is no record of any attempt to alter the week having ever failed, the allegation of impracticability is so far proved to be utterly baseless.

—Substantially the same idea as that described in the Chelmsford Nezeman publishes an account of "a strange and distressing scene" which took place a few days ago in the old parish church of Great Tey. The vicar, the Rev. Roger Burton, after giving out his text, intimated that he had been very much grieved of late to observe the increasing taste of his parishioners for jewelry and fine raiment. "After mature consideration," he said, which he had mourning drawn upon reflection, he had come to the conclusion that he would discard the use of gowns, and using strong language." This was, indeed, a strange and distressing scene; but that was not all. Mrs. Burton was equally resolved to rebuke human pride, and performed prodigies of valor in the Sunday-school. One child had a small penny locket on, which Mrs. Burton tore off. "Another child was put on a form, and the other children made to go round and laugh at the peacock." "Eight big girls were turned out because they had small sprays of flowers on their hats."

But the heroic battle was lauded by the cowardly tactics of the enemy. The teachers and the children rushed out of the school, and being joined by the older boys and girls and their mothers, the scene of hooting and yelling was painful in the extreme." All the more painful that "this parish has hitherto always been noted for its peaceful and respectable inhabitants." Mr. Carlyle and Mr. Ruskin should go to the assistance of these reformers, who are born too late into too old a world.—London Examiner.

Transparency of Metals.

To see through a millstone of a building all has usually been regarded as a feat requiring for its accomplishment powers possessed by human beings only when in a spiritualistic trance, or when otherwise rendered clairvoyant; and to see through a mass of metal is ordinarily regarded as equally impossible to human visual organs. It is true that it is known to all beaters of gold-leaf may be beaten so fine as to transmit a greenish light tolerably readily; and, indeed, this is utilized as a practical test of the quality of gold by the gold-beater, the admixture of small quantities of silver with the gold employed causing a distinguishable alteration in the tint of the transmitted light. Hitherto, however, this property of luminiferous vibrations to pass through metals has been regarded as peculiar to gold, and belonging to no other metal, the reason for this being, no doubt, to some extent, that few metals other than gold can be successfully reduced by hammering to the requisite degree of tenuity. Platinum, silver and platinum, indeed no metals approach to gold, by electrical means, however, thin films of gold and other metals can be obtained which readily transmit light, the mode of operating to produce these attenuated sheets of metal being simply to cause electric sparks to pass from wires of the required metals existing into tubes of rarefied air or other gases, when the particles of metal detached from the wires by the sparks become deposited on the sides of the glass, forming an excessively thin film of gold and platinum under the microscope. Gold films thus prepared transmit a fine green light, silver gives a lineblue color, copper a dull green; platinum a bluish gray; zinc and cadmium a deep bluish gray; iron a nearly neutral tint, but slightly brownish.—London Society.

Titans and Men.

"Blessed are the meek," exclaims the voice of inspiration, but can a man be meek with the consciousness that a dreaded monster is pummeling his vitals. We are not aware of a Prometheus who might stand chained to the torturing rock and, in measure poetically guessing his fiver, and his face over with an expression of heroic and even calm endurance. But Prometheus has left no descendants in vulgar life (therapy assuming his liver, the modern man makes himself out a Titan around him miserable. Feel glumsy, hypochondriacal, he sees the world and life all on the wrong side—No wonder that everything can be pre-judged as a gloomy one, he regards as an unbearable burden the smoker of his imaginary woes. Unlike the mythical Titan, there is no eagle that succorless. There is no arm to rescue—a balm to relieve. As remedies for this most depressing of all diseases—biliousness—there are many, but the efficient or specific one is Hostetter's Stomach Bitters. Persistent Purgatives and Pellets. The Pellets effectually remove the offending and poisonous matter, while the Medicinal Bitters restore strength and health to the entire system. They are sold by druggists.

—Baking Powder Cake.—White of one egg; one cup of white sugar; one-half cup of sweet milk; one and one-third teaspoons of baking powder; one and one-third cups of sifted flour.

Soaking peas a few minutes in benzoline, or warm paraffine, before planting, is said by a correspondent of the Gardener's Chronicle to entirely prevent the ravages of mice and birds on the seed.

—Nummer Cake.—One cup of butter; two cups of sugar; two tablespoons of molasses; three cups of flour; four eggs; one teaspoon of soda; two teaspoons of cream tartar; one cup of raisins; spice to taste.

—For cattle that cannot raise their cud, boil three or four at a time of ordinary sized stalks of white pulled chips between the grinders; pass them up as they grind them; keep the animals grinding the chips for ten or fifteen minutes; then put some wheat or corn corn or of a little hay into their mouth. Few, if any, cases occur that to timely help cannot be given. Cattle that have lost their cud are not likely to take food into their mouths.—Rural Home.

—In hostiness no man can be entirely successful without sufficient knowledge to enable him to make the best possible use of his labor and his means. The most extensive and varied knowledge, practical and scientific, will not always relieve the farmer from doubt and uncertainty, but he should improve every means of investigation and research, and avail himself of every opportunity for discussing questions relating to production, markets, etc., within his reach.—Detroit Tribune.

—Sweet pickles of ripe cucumbers, or green tomatoes, or both, may be made. Prepare the cucumbers by scraping out the inside and paring the outside then cut in small pieces, let them lay in weak salt-and-water all night, or half a day; then drain them out, put them in a porcelain kettle, and cover with one-third vinegar and two-thirds water; let them boil about fifteen minutes, or till you can pierce with a straw; then take them from, drain and throw the liquor away; then, for one peck of green tomatoes, or the same quantity of ripe cucumbers, take two pounds of brown sugar, tablespoonfuls each of allspice, cloves, ginger and mustard, one teaspoonful of cayenne pepper; put in the kettle with two quarts of vinegar, or enough to cover; when hot, put in the cucumbers, let them boil, and they are done. I like mine with more sugar. Cor. Household.

The roller should be as much an accompaniment of the farm as the harrow or drill, and it would have been sold in its favor there are very few scattered through the country where there should be many. We use a roller to pack the earth about seed that are sown, of all sorts, whether in the garden or on the farm, on our light land, and sometimes on heavy or heavy soils to crush clods and lumps. We harrow and roll our old pastures, our winter wheat and sometimes the meadows. The last, after it is well soaked with rain, can be leveled more easily with a roller than other, and the drive is kept in shape constantly by an occasional rolling. There is a wonderful difference in the kinds of rollers used upon the farm. An old log may be tugged up and answer some purpose, but it pays in the end to have a substantial, well-made implement that is adapted to the work that is to be done; then it pays to keep it in a good state of repair, well housed and oiled, so as not to disturb a whole neighborhood every time it makes a revolution.—Detroit Free Press.

More Legs—Less Wheels.

FARMERS are fast learning the lesson that four feet are better than two wheels, that a good way to market grain is to walk it to market. That corn put on legs is enhanced in value; that time economy is practiced, when only the valuable portion of a crop is put upon the market, and when that crop is put into meat, or its condition is such as will by one other step produce it, be less extracted from the offering of the sod the gold and left the dross. Again, the raising of cattle, swine, sheep and horses combines the necessity for so much of machinery and expense in preparing for the harvests, and leaves the soil richer and the owner more of a profit.

It seems but the morning—its very dawn at that—of the stock interests of the great West; the problem of marketing the cattle product has been satisfactorily solved; another step in the great search for economy has been found; the farmer saves by reducing grain to animals and making them take themselves to market, and the shipper has found that the carcass can be prepared and handled in foreign markets in even better condition than when starting, and the carrying of all the refuse saved; and to-day we can furnish England with beef cheaper than she can produce it from her own slaughter pens. It is an established rule that no general movement is complete in its results, until the producer and consumer are brought into the most intimate relations possible. The Pellets effectually remove the offending and poisonous matter, while the Medicinal Bitters restore strength and health to the entire system. They are sold by druggists.

Bathing: How Often, and When.

Bathing has something to do with our supposed necessities in regard to bathing. Some respectable persons never bathe the whole body except in warm weather. Others cannot be comfortable, cannot feel clean, without a daily bath. Those who have a daily bath usually take it on rising from bed in the morning. For this purpose some use water of any temperature which the season may make most convenient, even taking icy water in winter, and bathing in a cold room. Some who have followed this practice for years, have become convinced that it has brought much misbehief, and that only great robustness of constitution ever enabled them to endure the tax upon their native vigor so long. Most physicians do not advise so frequent bathing, considering a weekly or semi-weekly bath sufficiently frequent for cleanliness. Something depends upon the season or climate, and much depends upon the manner of bathing and the previous condition of the bather. It is an established rule that no general bath should follow very closely upon a meal. The stomach should be allowed to recuperate after the first consideration for at least an hour after filling it, during which time no great demand must be made upon brain, muscles or skin. The stomach, when full, demands more than its usual portion of blood, so that the surface of the body is sometimes made chilly on account of a heavy or difficult meal. Where cool water, or much friction, is applied to the skin, an immediate demand for blood is made at the surface of the body, and of course stomach and skin cannot both successfully make these demands at the same time. Sudden death has been known to result from a full bath immediately after eating. I can't help thinking that many little children have suffered from the carelessness or ignorance of their mothers, or nurses, in regard to the rule. I have known more than one mother to bathe and dress her little child immediately after its dinner, just because this time was most convenient. This rule, however, does not apply strictly to infants while fed wholly on milk. The stomach of a little babe holds but a very small quantity, and this, being soon digested, does not require a very long period for its digestion. It does not seem necessary to wait more than an hour after nursing a baby, before giving it its mild little bath, which, of course, is never given in a cold room. If you wait too long, baby sometimes gets very hungry and complains loudly before the dressing is all completed. Physicians sometimes recommend that baths be taken when the body is at its greatest point of vigor, or near noon; but however this may apply to sick persons, in respect to their curative baths, it cannot well be obeyed by busy people, in their weekly or semi-weekly baths for cleanliness. A housekeeper will usually take her bath on rising, in the morning, or when she changes her clothes after the dinner work is done, or when she goes to bed. One should not bathe when much fatigued, but if not especially worry, a bath just before bed is a good thing—not cold—or cold bath, but a good washing with comfortable water, candly given if the room is cool; but, if possible, the room should be warm.—Faith Be Better, in American Agriculturist.

—A new theory, based chiefly on chemical considerations, is propounded by Prof. Mendeleieff regarding the formation of petroleum in the interior of the earth. From the fact that the Pennsylvania petroleum occurs in the Devonian and Silurian rocks, it appears to him highly improbable that the fluid hydrocarbon should be the result of the decomposition of organic remains, for but little organic life existed in the waters of those times. His theory, starting with Laplace's hypothesis of the formation of our globe, assumes the existence of masses of iron and, along with it, of inorganic carbon, in the inner parts of the earth. The water which, from the cracks in the exterior regions, penetrates to the molten metal, is decomposed; its oxygen goes to the iron, whilst the hydrogen unites, under the influence of great heat and pressure, with the carbon, to form the varieties of hydrocarbons which make up petroleum.

The Ohio State Journal comes to the defense of President Hayes, and says: "The man does not live who is more earnestly anxious for the welfare of the loyalists of the South, white and black, than the President, and no man will do more or sacrifice more to promote that welfare."

The call for an extra session of Congress has finally been issued, the day for convening being fixed at October 15 This postponement of the extra session until October has taken the county somewhat by surprise. It seems that, upon careful examination into the affairs of various departments, it was ascertained that, without serious embarrassment, the machinery could be kept in motion until the date fixed.

THE war in Europe drags its slow length along. A battle has been fought in which the Russians were repulsed with a loss of 4,000 killed and wounded. They want you, Grant at the head of that Russian army, to make things a little livelier.

WOOD.—Shippers and vessel owners are somewhat "down in the mouth" over the stagnation in the wood market, —it being a hard matter to sell a cargo of wood in Chicago or Milwaukee for more than $4 per cord, and the prospects are not very encouraging for a rise.

IT is stated that the Episcopalians are about to look up a Ministerial resort. Now it is in order for our northern friends and their railroad allies to appoint a committee to watch the trains and head off the reverend gentemen, especially if they are inclined to look south of Petoskey for a resting place.

An endless variety of day goods, fancy goods, and notions, just received at Fox, Rose & Buttars.

SINCE the expiration of the sewing machine patents, the Singer Company has reduced the price of its machines one half, and still there is a handsome profit for the manufacturers.

THE BURNHAM.—The oft recurring and troublesome question of what we shall do with our bridge is forced upon us this spring with redoubled perplexity. On Wednesday, a vessel passing through the superannuated old monument of foolishness which spans Pine River in this place, carried away one stanchion with its braces, causing a suspension of travel across it, and incurring a consid erable expense for its repair. It strikes us that the time has arrived for the people or corporation upon whom the duty properly devolves to take such action as shall stop this leak of public money. During the last season about $200 was expended in repairs on the thing, and now, the town has been compelled to employ one to tend it during the season, at a salary of $15 per month each. From the fact that a larger class of vessels are to trade here this season than ever before the danger to the bridge and to vessel property has correspondingly increased. If the fact is acknowledged that a bridge must be built sooner or later, and the other fact is also apparent that the interest on a bonded debt of $3,000 would hardly exceed our present expense in repairs on the present structure, why should not the matter receive immediate attention! Let us properly distinguish true and false economy.

HOUSE PLANTS, ETC.—We invite the inspection of our friends and neighbors to a choice collection of house plants at our residence, from the Greenhouse of John Suttle, located at Grand Rapids. We venture the assertion that for a new start a finer show of plants cannot be found anywhere for the prices as shown in the catalogue. We cannot see why people who love a pleasant home can be without a collection of house plants, when they can be secured at such low prices. Send for a catalogue to John Suttle, Florist, Grand Rapids, Mich.

LAKE USE.—A very serious disaster to our lake marine occured on Monday night, 7th, on Lake Huron, and resulted in the total loss of a fine schooner, the capsizing of one of the finest steam barges on the lake, and the loss of at least two lives. The steam barge David W. Rust, bound up, coal laden, and the schooner Francis Berriman, collided when about 20 miles southeast of Thunday Bay. The blow given the Berriman was a terrible one, and she sank in 15 minutes in very deep water. It is known that two lives were lost, presumably men of the schooner's crew. Eight men were saved by the Rust. The latter craft is in a terribly shattered state, and barely succeeded in getting into east Tawas, where she is in a sinking condition. The last schooner was laden with 40,000 bushels of wheat, and the Rust was coal laden. The Francis Berriman was a splendid craft, and was valued, even in these hard times, at [illegible] $30,000, though she might have cost twice that amount.

A feverish thirst that refuses to be quenched by drinking water may be allayed in the following manner: Throw a slice of bread upon burning coal, and when it is all aflame throw it into a tumbler of water. This remedy has been tested and proved good.

It is said that Turkey wants to borrow money of England. Also that she won't get it

QUEEN VICTORIA has sent her son, the Duke of Edinburgh, to look after the Sea Canal.

THE war news continues to be of a contradictory nature. A little fighting has been done, and the reports lean either toward the Russian or Turk, according to the side from which the dispatch is sent.

MR. W J. Smith, of the firm of Shepard & Smith, has sold his interest to the drug business to A. B. Shepard. Hereafter the business will be run by A. B. Shepard. Mr. Smith has taken the position as clerk at the Occidental House—Petoskey Democrat.

RUSSIA has threatened that if England unites with Turkey a Russian army will invade India A collision has occured between the Turks and Greeks, and the latter are fast for war. The Russians have crossed the Danubeat Pottock and entered Dobrudscha, and also at Ibrail. An engagement was proceeding at Potback at last accounts.

President Hayes, in a recent interview, expressed himself as confident that his Southern policy will finally strengthen and redeem the Republican party, though it has been productive of some discords at the outset. Whatever may be said against his course, no one will question his sincerity or charge him with inconsistency. He has exhibited a strong practical adherence to his convictions, and endeavored without swerving to bring about a realization of his theories.

The Ohio State Journal comes to the defence of President Hayes, and says: "The man does not live who is more earnestly anxious for the welfare of the laydists of the South, white and black, than the President, and no man will do more or sacrifice more to promote that welfare."

The call for an extra session of Congress has finally been issued, the day for convening being fixed at October 15 This postponement of the extra session until October has taken the county somewhat by surprise. It seems that, upon careful examination into the affairs of various departments, it was ascertained that, without serious embarrassment, the machinery could be kept in motion until the date fixed.

Caleb Cushing is of the opinion that present extraordinary price of wheat is largely speculative and cannot be maintained. A considerable stock of grain is held up in European Granaries in anticipation of war; the present year's sowing of wheat is not much if less than that of former years su Russia

On the 5th, the following proclamation of the President was issued, convening Congress on the 15th of October next.

Whereas, the final adjournment of the Forty-fourth Congress without making the usual appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1878, presents an extraordinary occasion, requiring the President to exercise the power vested in him by the Constitution to convene the Houses of Congress in anticipation of the day fixed by law for their next meeting; now, therefore, I, Rutherford B. Hayes, President of the United States, do, by virtue of the power to this end in me vested by the Constitution, convene both Houses of Congress to assemble at their respective chambers at twelve o'clock noon, on Monday, the 15th day of October next, then and there to consider and determine such measures as in their wisdom their duty and the welfare of the people may seem to demand.

In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand, and caused the seal of the United States to be affixed.

Done at the City of Washington, this 5th day of May, in the year of our Lord 1877, and the independence of the United States of America the one hundred and first.

(Signed) R. B. Hayes.

William M. Evarts, Secretary of State.

"The overthrow of the lawful State Government was appropriately celebrated today. Did peace justice require that the banners of the achievement should be thus equally divided? In the election of the Commission, the gray accorded the post of honor to the blue, and seized nothing. The Custom House and Postoffice closed in admiration of the deed. It is probable that United States interference will not be required hereafter.

"S. B. Packard."

OUR NEW YORK LETTER.

New York, May 18, 1877

Presumably for the purpose of creating a reaction of public feeling in their favor at a moment when their case might be ripe for agitation, as well as to demonstrate to the rural man their dignity and importance the canine aristocracy have this week been in Congress assembled. The place of meeting was Gilmore's Garden, and the full title of the assemblage, The First Annual ew York Beach Show of Dogs. It is rather curious to note how surely persecution engenders sympathy. Two months ago it did not seem as though there was a soul in town except Mr. Bergh who could be called a friend of the dog. The annihilation of the whole tribe seemed to be demanded, and blood-thirsty ordinances were proposed for its repression. No sooner, however, did the dog law pass, prescribing collar, license, muzzle and a four foot string for leading in the street, or else instant death, than the tide seemed to turn and curious began to hear less about "the useless and dangerous nuisance," and more about "man's faithful friend." To cap the climax the Westminster Kennel Club got up the show just closed, and then the revulsion was complete.

The collection of dogs contained about twelve hundred animals, comprising pretty near every known variety from the giant Ulm and St. Bernard breeds down to the tiny black and tan weighing a pound or two and so "fancy bred," technically speaking, as to be almost hairless and constantly shivering. Hunting dogs were naturally most largely represented and included most of the valuable animals. Many of these were ticketed $1,000 a few $5,000 one or two $10,000, and upon one deerhound bred in Queen Victoria's kennels was fixed the astounding price of 10,000 pounds sterling, or $50,000 in gold. It is calculated to engender respect in the Leinster to interview dogs who represent in their own shaggy persons more money than most of us are likely to ever get hold of; but so far as my experience goes, these canine princes are just as affable and even demonstrative in their treatment of visitors as though they couldn't raise money enough to pay a lyceum fee and keep out of the dog catcher's hands.

The exhibition was a success financially, and still more so in point of interest. Between two and three thousand dollars were given as prizes in the shape of money, silver cups, guns, etc., and something of a balance will be turned over to Mr. Bergh, who intends to use it in carrying out his long cherished plan for a home for sick and homeless dogs. The attendance was a jam from beginning to end, and its decidedly high-toned character forebodes an increase in the dog fever, which has already become epidemic among our upper ten.

The show had many ludicrous features, but nothing funnier than an episode on Tuesday afternoon when the above named benevolent gentleman tried to make a speech to the company assembled. Of course, the numerous pups who either didn't like their temporary quarters or whose feelings were hurt by their masters' desertion gave constant vent to their woes in a deafening chorus of howls and yelps. When Mr. Bergh opened his mouth to speak the Pandemonium of sound swelled up with ten-fold violence. He tried to go on with his speech but the clamor of his ungrateful constituents reduced his rhetoric to dumb show. Three or four times a lull in the tumult encouraged him to proceed, when as though by a preconcerted arrangement the dogs would belch forth volumes of complaint. The President of the Society for the Protection, etc., looked very mad, and at last, amid the shouts and applause of the audience, backed down and cut darting a parting glance at his noisy tormentors which threatened vague horrors.

Our long talked of Carnival is at hand at last. A carnival in the middle of May, after Lent is past and forgotten, might well seem an anomaly to the original maskers of the old world, whose softer climate allows it to come in its proper place, just before the long season of fasting and prayer. It is a good deal more sensible, however, for us in this latitude to have the festival, which in spite of its spurious origin is celebrated only for itself, at a season when processions and outdoor fun generally don't have to be smothered in overcoats. This first New York carnival is to be something of a rival of the southern cities, being ushered by a chosen king, whose burlesque proclamation, printed on mammoth illuminated posters, ornaments our street corners and hotels. The programme includes immense processions both day and evening, the festivities culminating in a grand masked ball at night at Gilmore's Garden, which will be floored over for the purpose at a cost of $2,500. From this ball I presume no New York clerk who can raise $5 for a ticket will permit himself to be absent. On the whole the affair promises to be a success of its kind, and next week I shall be able to say how well these promises were fulfilled.

The mania for hunting up Capt. Kidd's buried money has not yet expired. A society has been formed in a neighboring coast town called the Society for Unearthing Hidden Treasure, which all who are in a hurry to get rich and are too lazy to work are cordially invited to join. This worthy corporation has just been thrown into a flutter by a letter from a Brooklyn man who knows where there is a big nest of gold and jewels buried on Long Island. What removes all doubt as to the genuineness of this discovery is the fact that the disinterested writer wants them to send him $1,500 to pay the cost of digging up the box. They do say that the fools are not all dead yet.

Mr. John T. Daly, an old an prominent New Yorker, a millionaire and the owner of the Windsor Hotel, which is the finest in the city, has added one more proof of the prevailing suicide epidemic by mysteriously disappearing from his accustomed haunts, and after a days walking on Long Island, hanging himself in a lonely and deserted barn, where his body was accidentally discovered.

There is rejoicing at the Aquarium over the temporary return of the prodigal sailed Japanese fish "No No" for which its owners refused Mr. Coup's offer of $2,000 cash, but which they have consented to loan to the institution. It may be remembered that I described this finny wonder in a previous letter. The successful importation of this beautiful fish is entirely due to the enterprise of Messrs. Martin Gillet & Co., an old established tea house, who in their endeavors to introduce into the United States Ile No ten (an uncolored tea in papers, such as the Chinese themselves drink) have made many trips to the East, and taking advantage of their opportunities, have at various times collected and distributed many rare natural curiosities.

Booth's Theater is again open under the management of Messrs. Bignell and Tillotson for a gala season. The opening piece is the old favorite Black Eyed Susan, in which Rignold has achieved some of his most brilliant conquests. At the Fifth Avenue Theatre Miss Neilson is playing simultaneous to full houses.

Ole Bull has given his last farewell concert and started for Europe. Paul de Chaillu, the African explorer, friend of Livingston and Stanley, has been lecturing to the news-boys at their lions. It was amusing to see the little gamins, whose chief delight is to devour the highly spiced stories of boys' papers and yellow covered literature generally, fairly hanging upon the lips of the entertaining little traveler, who was able to draw from his own experience tales of adventure thrilling enough to satisfy the most inveterate little lover of blood and thunder in his audience.

At the Union Square a new dramatization from Nicholas Nickleby entitled "Smike" has commenced what promises to be a successful run. Bijou Heron, the pretty and talented little daughter of Matilda Heron sustains the title role.

A Sterling Vegetable Remedy

Which Eradicates
DISEASE OF THE THROAT AND LUNGS, DYSPEPSIA, GRAVEL, PILES, URINARY TROUBLES, NERVOUS DEBILITY, PALPITATION OF THE HEART, TORPIDITY OF THE LIVER, CONSTIPATION, SCROFULOUS AFFECTIONS, AND FEMALE COMPLAINTS.

For nearly a quarter of a century this sterling preparation has been effecting cures of the various diseases to which it is adapted, and thousands of persons, of perfect reliability, in all classes of society have borne evidence to its wondrous remedial efficacy.

As a remedy for diseases of the Throat and Lungs it has achieved a popularity rivalled by that of few proprietary remedies. Experience has shown that for those who are troubled with weakness of the Lungs it is the best possible protective against Consumption, and it may be relied on with certainty to eradicate Bronchitis, Asthma, Croup, Diptheria, and Soreness of the Chest.

Coughs of the most obstinate kind are speedily overcome by it, and since a simple cough is very prone to develop into serious inflammation of the Lungs, the early use of Dr. WISHART'S PINE TREE TAR CORDIAL is earnestly recommended, as it invariably prevents the further progress of the disease.

Dyspepsia, Loss of Appetite, Torpidity of the Liver and of the Kidneys are promptly overcome by this superb vegetable corrective, which not only regulates but strengthens the organs of digestion, as well as those of the urinary and biliary secretions. It imparts unwonted relish for the food, and, by promoting digestion and assimilation, enriches the blood, which is the natural motor of vital energy and nutriment to the system.

Dr. L. O. C. Wishart's Pine Tree Tar Cordial thoroughly regulates the Bowels, removes Biliuf and Bleeding Piles, banishes from the circulation dropsical and all other impurities, and effectually counteracts a tendency to Gravel. It also entirely obviates the weaknesses incident to females.

Dr. L. O. C. Wishart's Pine Tree Tar Cordial is no mere placebo. It is a standard medicine, and has been repeatedly recognized as such by the press and members of the medical profession, who emphatically endorse the popular verdict long since rendered in its favor.

Sold by Druggists everywhere.

A Sterling Vegetable Remedy
Which Eradicates
DISEASES OF THE THROAT AND LUNGS, DYSPEPSIA, GRAVEL, PILES, URINARY TROUBLES, NERVOUS DEBILITY, PALPITATION OF THE HEART, TORPIDITY OF THE LIVER, CONSTIPATION, SCROFULOUS AFFECTIONS, AND FEMALE COMPLAINTS.

For nearly a quarter of a century this sterling preparation has been effecting cures of the various diseases to which it is adapted, and thousands of persons, of perfect reliability, in all classes of society have borne evidence to its wondrous remedial efficacy.

As a remedy for diseases of the Throat and Lungs it has achieved a popularity rivalled by that of few proprietary remedies. Experience has shown that for those who are troubled with weakness of the Lungs it is the best possible protective against Consumption, and it may be relied on with certainty to eradicate Bronchitis, Asthma, Croup, Diptheria, and Soreness of the Chest.

Coughs of the most obstinate kind are speedily overcome by it, and since a simple cough is very prone to develop into serious Inflammation of the Lungs, the early use of Dr. Wishart's Pine Tree Tar Cordial is earnestly recommended, as it invariably prevents the further progress of the disease.

Dyspepsia, Loss of Appetite, Torpidity of the Liver and of the Kidneys are promptly overcome by this superb vegetable corrective, which not only regulates but strengthens the organs of digestion, as well as those of the urinary and biliary secretions. It imparts unwonted relish for the food, and, by promoting digestion and assimilation, enriches the blood, which is the natural motor of vital energy and nutriment to the system.

Dr. L. O. C. Wishart's Pine Tree Tar Cordial thoroughly regulates the Bowels, removes Blind and Bleeding Piles, banishes from the circulation dropsical and all other impurities, and effectually counteracts a tendency to Gravel. It also entirely obviates the weaknesses incident to females.

Dr. L. O. C. Wishart's Pine Tree Tar Cordial is no mere placebo. It is a standard medicine, and has been repeatedly recognized as such by the press and members of the medical profession, who emphatically endorse the popular verdict long since rendered in its favor.

PATTERNS DOMESTIC

The Campaign in Asia.

According to the Turkish report, the Russians have advanced to the westward of Kars, and are intent on intercepting the communications between that fortress and Erzerum. The Turkish command sought to defeat this movement by sending troops from Kars to oppose the advancing Russians. An engagement ensued which proved indecisive. It is now apparent that the Russian armies are concentrating upon Erzerum, and will simply invest Kars until the greater fortress falls into their hands. The latter is crossed by four main roads. The most northern starts from Poti, the terminus of a railway from Tiflis. This road, after crossing the Turkish frontier, forks at Batoum, whence one branch runs along the coast to Trebizond, while the other goes direct to Erzerum. The second road crosses the frontier close to the Russian fortress of Ardahleh, and thence to Kars. The third is the direct road from Tiflis to Kars, crossing the frontier at the Russian fortress of Alexandropol. The fourth road leads from Erivan to Bayazid, thence to Erzerum. The Russians have begun their advance on the last-named road by capturing Bayazid. In 1828, Paskewitch only moved by the three southern routes; but the force at his command was no small in comparison to the army now launched against Turkey that the president is of no value at the present time.

Excepting of course Kars, there are no great barriers to the advance of the Russians on the roads leading to Erzerum. The army from Poti, turning off at Batum, would pass through the defiles to the Valley of the Djoruk without meeting a fortress. On issuing on into the plain of Erzerum they would find themselves ranked on either hand by the little fortresses of Ispir and Thortum. These, however, are over twelve miles apart, and Thortum could be masked and besieged by a small force while the main body marched out at each of its guns upon Erzerum. The road from Acoulzeh to Kars was used by the Russians in 1828–29. It is rough and is barred by the fortress of Ardahan. In 1828 this place surrendered without defense, but this was in the first feeling of depression consequent upon the fall of Acbalzich, after one of the most desperate defenses ever related in history. Ardahan is small but strong. Its defences are not, however, proof against the improved artillery with which the Russian army is supplied. On the short, level road which leads from Alexandropol to Kars there are no obstacles to the Russian advance. On the fourth road leading to Erzerum the fortress of Bayazid was the main barrier. Having captured this, the Russians could march direct to Erzerum the fortress of Bayazid was the main barrier. Having captured this, the Russians could march direct to Erzerum, or, if they preferred it, could follow the Persian frontier, and advance through Toprak Kaleh, or more probably it will march due west, pass the Dingel Dagh Mountains and the Eastern Euphrates, and then, turning north, come down upon the main road to Erzerum, in the rear of the Turkish army.

The invaders would thus have marched nearly all the line of frontier which Russia covets. Kars is a strong outpost. It repulsed invaders several times prior to the Russian attack in 1828, when it fell after a very short siege. In the Crimean war it fell again, but this time by a slow process of starvation. The garrison upon that occasion was a very strong one, almost as large as the besieging army, and the Turks have always maintained that it ought not to have been sent up in the rear, but ought to have fought in the open. The position of Kars as a fortress is faulty, except as covering a large intrenched camp. As a citadel only it is useless, as the country to its south is sufficiently level and open for an army to march past out of reach of its guns. There is another road through Kaghizman, twenty miles further south, and the position can be turned altogether by invading armies advancing either by the Djorik road or that by Ararat. If, however, it be well provisioned and used as an intrenched camp for a corps d' armee, it must be reduced by a garrison sufficient to leave an army can move forward either by the main or southern road. It is said that the fortifications have been increased and strengthened, and another famous siege may be looked for. Erzerum is strategically a far more important fortress than Kars. It blocks the main road and that coming up the Djorik Valley from the coast, and, in fact, bars the passage of any army coming to the northward of the Bingol Bagh range. It is fairly fortified, and it new redoubts have been thrown up on the sides from which it is to some extent commanded by modern artillery, it should make a long and stout resistance. It has, however, the disadvantage of being a large and populous city, being the Capital of Asia Minor. Food may be laid in by an active and energetic Governor for the use of a garrison for months, but it is scarcely possible for the inhabitants of a large city to do so. It is therefore, the Turkish army be routed in the field, it can scarcely be expected that Erzerum would be able to stand a lengthened siege.

Having considered the line of advance of the Russians, the line of defense which the Turks might occupy may be examined. The line most, of course, depend greatly upon the strength of their army. But, supposing them to have any proportion still to the invading force of the Russians, the position which they should take up appears clearly indicated by strategical consideration. A force of some 10,000 men, in addition to the garrison, should be encamped under the guns of Kars or Erzerum. The latter force should be destined to take up a fighting position on the approach of the Russian column from the Djorik, at a point where, aided by the guns of Thortum, it would check the advance of the enemy, and, if this were found impossible, fall back upon the Capital. The natives of the hill districts, aided by what irregulars may be disposable, should harass the column in its march up the Djorik defile, and should, after its passage, entirely cut its communication with the sea. The main Turkish Army should take part with its right and left resting upon the hills of the fortresses of Beli Musa and Getshevan, which are about twenty miles apart, and are about twenty miles to the south-east of Kars. In this position they could throw their whole force upon a column trying to pass south of Kars, with a view of advancing on Erzerum, they could march to their right and crush a column advancing through Toprak Kaleh, or strike on a back coming along the Kaghizman road. Upon the other hand, their own line of retreat to Erzerum, in case of defeat, would be open to them, while the pursuit would be checked by the guns of the fortresses, while they could be with difficulty attacked as long as Kars resisted, because the corps there would threaten the invader's communication and sally out upon him in case of defeat.—N. Y. Tribune.

The Joke Reversed.

A very good story is circulating among the men about town, at the expense of one of their number. The story is to the effect that two middle-aged gentlemen engaged, some nights ago, in dalliance with the fowl to such an extent that one or them, thinking himself a trifle less dazed than the other, conceived the idea that it would be a good plan to take the latter to an asylum whose inebriates sometimes are received, and leave him there under treatment. He called a hack, succeeded in getting his friend into it, informed a number of cronies who chanced to be present what the joke was, and, getting in with the other, was driven off. It was some distance to the asylum, and during the trip a change came over the condition of the two men in the carriage. The one whose head was tolerably clear when the trip began, became gradually confused under the influence of what he had taken, while the man who was most intoxicated in the beginning recovered consciousness rapidly. As he recovered and noticed the direction the carriage was taking, he, making, also, certain inquiries of the driver, he perceived the trick his friend was playing upon him. He resolved to reverse the thing. The practical joker was in a condition to be readily managed by the time the asylum was reached, and was conveyed within and handed over to those in charge, without difficulty and without protest on his part. It was explained that he would be left at the place until the excellent treatment practiced by the institution should restore him to sobriety. Then the carriage drove away and the unconscious subject was left to recover his senses. He awoke sober the next morning, and the real nature of the situation dawned upon him. He endeavored to leave, but couldn't, and remained unmarred for some time before he was relieved by his joking friend, who had come on first best. Such, at least, is the story.—St. Louis Republican.

Maternal Remembrance.

A lady was riding in her carriage among the mountains, when they came upon an old woman, with a funny little hood on her head and a staff to her hand, walking on alone. She was neat and clean, and her skin was soft and delicate, but her back was bent and she was barefoot.

The lady saw she was shoeless, and stopped her carriage.

"Here is some money," said the lady, in a tender tone.

"What for?" said the woman, looking up pleasantly.

"To buy shoes for your poor feet. Do you want a pair of shoes?"

The woman laughed a little low laugh, which seemed to come from a heart filled with simple, happy thoughts.

"Don't you want a pair of shoes?" asked the lady, a little hurt.

"I s'pose I do," said the woman; "but I didn't think of anybody's giving them to me."

"Take this bill, please, and buy you a pair," said the lady.

"God bless and reward you!" answered the woman, heartily.

The carriage drove on, and the lady sank back on her seat, with tears in her eyes.

"O!" said she, "I thought I saw my own mother in that dear old lady. She has just such a sweet face and pleasant voice. You don't know how I felt when I thought of thy mother, old and feeble, walking with sore feet over the rough rocky road."

If we all saw fathers and mothers, brothers and sisters, in the poor, and in the cold, and the hungry, what a world this would soon be!—Child's World.

Transmitting Photographs by Telegraph.

A French savant has proposed some method by which a photograph may be transmitted from one place to another by the agency of the telegraphic wire; but we have not yet been able to learn anything of the means proposed to be adopted for securing so desirable an end.

We are, however, says the British Journal of Photography, in a position to give details of a method by which a photograph may be transmitted with the "speed of thought" to any part of the world with which the sender is placed in electrical communication. But this transmission is subject to compliance with certain modifications by which the original character of the picture, as a photograph, must be slightly altered, although this alteration does not necessarily any greater than that to which it has to be subjected before it meets the eye of the public as an engraving in any of our illustrated periodicals.

Rather more than twenty years since, Mr. F. C. Bakewell, the author of a treatise on "Electric Science" and other philosophical works, invented what he termed "the copying telegraph." By means of this system any one handwriting or drawing upon a sheet of paper prepared in the way we have indicated. It, too, like the former cylinder, must be pressed upon with a needle-point tracer, and, like the original, it must also be made to rotate at a certain velocity previously determined upon, and finally it, too, must be made to move slowly from end to end, so that the point shall pass over it in a continuous line or spiral. It only now remains that, all things being ready, the clock-work be started, when the former cutter will rotate under a point which is transmitting electricity subject to the interruptions caused by the letters of the message. As the point passes on from one letter to forming within a circuit and lateral direction at the same rate, it is evident that every touch of the tracer on the original communication will be rendered visible on the black paper at the other end of the wire, the only difference being that whereas the original communication is dark on a white ground, the message is received in light letters on a dark ground.

To transmit a photograph in accordance with the principle here laid down, it is first of all necessary that it be converted into lines. With our present knowledge of electrical communication, we must not expect the electric current to discriminate between thick and thin non-conductors; and until this has been achieved, if it ever will be, graduated tints must remain in abeyance. To convert a photograph —a portrait, for example—into lines, a print should be made on silver paper in the usual way, and this must be traced over with black ink, using a fine pen. When the tints have in this manner been translated into lines, the photograph is immersed in a diluted solution of bichloride of mercury in hydrochloric acid, by which the photographic image will disappear, leaving the pen-and-ink drawing only visible. If from this a negative be taken and a print in carbon be made upon a sheet of tinfoil, all the electrical conditions requisite for effecting the transmission of this drawing to any distance will have been complied with. The gelatin which forms the blacks, or lines, of the carbon print is a non-conductor; the base, on tinfoil, upon which the print has been developed, or to which it is permanently attached, is a conductor, and nothing else is required in order to effect the transmission of the picture in the manner we have described.

The accuracy of any likeness thus transmitted will depend upon two things: First, the fidelity with which the artist who is employed to make the pen-and-ink tracing effects his work; and, secondly, the adaptation of such means as will insure both cylinders the transmitting and receiving cylinder) rotating with a similar degree of speed—a matter involving no difficulty whatever.—Scientific American.

A Rat Conquers a Rattlesnake.

No one who has had experience with rats—and who has not?—need be told that, vermin as they are, they are not lacking in courage when cornered. But the most gifted fighter in a rat's fighting abilities would hardly think of pitting even the blackest and bravest of the Norway persuasion against a lively, pole-poisoned rattlesnake. True, the serpent is a slow-coach at best, and, so long as an opponent kept out of striking distance, nothing is to be feared. But, once he fastens a tang on any living creature, except it be a pig or a mangoose, that creature's days are popularly supposed to be numbered. As for rats and mice, they are food for even the subtlest of snakes, in the ordinary course of Nature, and even so innocent a monstrictor as the black snake makes no flurry in lunching on full-grown squirrels. There are exceptions to most rules, however, and within a small, wire-cloth, covered packing-box in the store of a prominent Boston manufacturing firm is now being exemplified one of the most curious of these exceptions. A short time since one of the members of the firm spent a few weeks hunting in Florida, and on his return he brought with him a monster rattlesnake—a gift of a friend. His acquaintanceship measured about five feet in length, and has a body the size of a man's arm, the white, yellow and brown of his rattlesnake livery being arranged in patches of various forms. The heavy triangular head, characteristic of venomous reptiles, has a stolid expression, and, in moments of excitement, the five rattles on his tail keep up an unpleasantly suggestive whirring. The snake, a present of rich richness and surprising length darts angrily from his turtle-like mouth. He is no sleepy, befuddled fellow, as may be readily imagined, but while awake and ready for an encounter of any kind. It was into the cage occupied by this snake that three days since a rather small-sized wharf-rat was introduced, in the expectation that the resident would form a meal for the stranger. The cylinding monster seemed to think so, too, for he darted at the unwilling visitor and caught him by the neck. The rat, who had hitherto been running around the cage to dodge out, gave a sharp squeal as he felt the serpent's fangs, and, twisting himself about, buried his teeth in the scaly side of his aggressor. The snake writhed, and twisted and rattled alarm notes of alarm as the rat kept his sharp incisors at work, and before the spectators could fairly comprehend what had happened, the little quadruped had shaken himself loose, and was hopping around the cage as unconcerned as a sheet of paper prepared in the way we have indicated. It, too, like the former cylinder, must be pressed upon with a needle-point tracer, and, like the original, it must also be made to rotate at a certain velocity previously determined upon, and finally it, too, must be made to move slowly from end to end, so that the point shall pass over it in a continuous line or spiral. It only now remains that, all things being ready, the clock-work be started, when the former cutter will rotate under a point which is transmitting electricity subject to the interruptions caused by the letters of the message. A Correction by Ex-Senator Wade.

CLEVELAND, Ohio, May 2.

The Leader to-morrow will contain the following from the Hon. B. F. Wade:

JEFFERSON, April 30, 1877.

To the Editor of the Leader:

In your issue of to-day are two articles relating to myself, copied from the New York Tribune. The first purports to come from Mr. Wael Lamon, of Washington, formerly Marshal of the District, uniting in substance that some time during Mr. Lincoln's Administration a conspiracy was formed by the Republicans in Congress opposed to his Administration to depose him from the Presidency, and to confer Mr. Fremont or myself in his place as Dictator, that a written memorandum of the compact was made at the time; that a copy of it was in the possession of Mr. Chase, and by him shown to Mr. Lincoln. The other article is a letter from a statement in all its parts as a willful and malignant falsehood, and if Mr. Ward Lamon ever made such a statement as is alleged to anyone, I pronounce him a liar. I saw Mr. Lamon in the House but one week, and had it related only to myself I should not have condescended to notice so silly a lie, but when I find that it has been respectable journals, and as it implicates many members of that brave old Congress that carried on the war triumphantly through the war, most of whom are in their graves, I thought such a scandal upon them should not be unnoticed.

Very respectfully yours, B. F. WADE.

Parson Brownlow on Himself.

I have been a laboring man all my life long, and have acted upon the Scriptural maxim of "earning my bread in the sweat of my brow. Though a Southern man in feeling and principle, I do not think it degrading to a man to labor; as the most Southern disunionists. Whether East or West, South or South, labor is the dignity of labor, and look for card to a day, not very far distant, when educated labor will be the salvation of the vast country. I am known throughout the length and breadth of the land as the "Fighting Parson," while I may say, without incurring the charge of egotism, that no man is more peaceable, as my neighbors will testify. Always easy, and always oppressed with security debts, few men in my section and of my limited means have given away more in the course of each year to charitable objects. I have never been arraigned in the church for improper conduct. I never played a card. I never was a profane swearer. I never drank a dram of liquor, until within a few years, when it was taken as a medicine. I never had a cigar or a chew of tobacco in my mouth. I never was in a ball-room, or at a dance, or attended a horse-race, and never witnessed their running save on the fair-grounds of my own county. I never married but one woman, and her I married. I am about six feet high, and have weighed as high as 175 pounds, when in health. My constitution as any man need desire. I have very few gray hairs in my head, and, although rather hard-favored than handsome for the last thirty years, and have a family of seven children.—From an Autobiographical Sketch in 1862.

Flogging a Negro to Cure Him of Rebelliousness.

The Times, of this city, after referring to the flogging of a negro preacher by Oglethorpe County, Ga., "to cure him of Republicanism," reprints the following paragraph from a newspaper published in that county: "Anthony Thurster, the negro preacher who was so severely whipped by a party of disguised men near Maxey's, recently, asks that we announce to his white friends that from now on he is done preaching for the present, and will devote himself entirely to his farm and family. He says he has received a call to preach at Lexington, Oglethorpe County, Ga., 'to cure him of Republicanism,'

George Eliot says that a war between Russia and Germany would be the most terrible war in Europe within living memory. Even that which is raging on the Danube and in the Caucasus, but of which that war will be the occasion, or rather the opportunity, Germany, he says is one vast camp. She is stronger than ever before and better fitted for war. This has been accomplished at the cost of the prosperity of the country. The design is to strike such a blow at France that all possibility of a war for revenge on Germany will be removed for at least a generation or two. In other words France is to be crushed. This has been impracticable so long as Russia remained at peace. Germany would have struck the blow before now had not the Czar by his firmness and decision decided that he would prevent it. Among the most urgent and persistent advisers and aiders of the war against Turkey has been the German ambassador at St. Petersburg. He has wrecked the Czar on Germany's absolute neutrality in any programme he might see fit to carry out. This was but a row to fit the back of that ally of France and make Germany free to operate upon France. If this is anything but vague guess work the commercial crisis in European history which is now coming to the front is but a modest and trivial prelude to the tragedy which is to be performed in the West.

H. W. Bellfield, the brilliant correspondent of the Cincinnati Commercial, is a teetotaler. He says that during his travels in the South he is invited at least two times a year to "take a drink." He always kindly, but politely, begs to be excused, giving as his reason that he never indulges in spirituous or malt liquors and he receives in a very amusing manner the effect of this announcement upon the average Southern gentleman. First, he looked the correspondent's feet, then slowly raises his eyes, taking in by degrees his whole person until he reaches the top of his head. Then the eyes are slowly depressed until they settle again on the ground, when he steps back one pace, plants his hands on his hips, and, after a moment's pause, says, with a tone of great astonishment, "Well, I'll be damned!"

According to the Turf, Field and Farm, the Nebraska farmers have begun the domestication of the buffalo. The wild animals, when young, are intimidated among herds of the tame stock, only one or two at a time. Half-and-quarter breeds are found to be very hardy, and in the yield of milk the cow ranks of mixed stock give even more than the average good Scotch milk. The experiment promises well, as the character of the wild animals is imparted to the domestic stock.

In Congressman Speer of Georgia represents the Democratic party in that State is officially failing to please. He says the question of separating the Pea-nut has already started a split, and predicts that there will be serious trouble when an attempt is made to nominate a Governor next fall. It seems so far as to say that the supporters of the President will be lucky enough by that time to elect their candidate.

False Impression.

It is generally supposed by a certain class of invalids, who are not practical or experienced, that Hydrozone is not to be used by delicate ladies as pleasant as Lavender Salts or Cologne. Our experience, which is not confined to a few cases, but extends to thousands, has proved to our knowledge, in all the various forms of Liver Complaints in all its forms, such as Costiveness, Sick Headache, Jaundice, Pain in the Side, Loss of Appetite, Dizziness of the Head, low spirits, &c., &c. Out of 30,000 dozen bottles sold last year, not a single failure was reported, but thousands of complimentary letters received from Druggists of wonderful cures. Three doses will prove its merits. Oh, the bitter, relentless, heart piercing and soul-rending darts of slander! The arrow pierces but one perceptible object, but the silent poison steals into the life-blood of the mother and the father, and the friends, saping their hopes and blasting their parental aspirations. The foul mouthed slanderer always has his full measure of public indignation, but there are cases where a little raw-hide and rotten eggs mixed constitute a just and well deserved retribution.

All Wanting clothing would do well to call and examine our stock and learn prices before buying. See & Washburn.

WHAT LOCAL PAPERS DO.—As to change combats with considerable vigor the argument that the metropolitan papers are cheaper and better because they give more columns of reading matter for the money. Do the metropolitan papers give you any home news? Do they contain notices of your schools, churches, meetings, improvements, and hundreds of other local matters of interest, which your paper publishes? Do you ever see a word calculated to draw attention to your county and its towns, and aid in its progress and enterprises? And yet there are men who take such contracted views of the matter that unless they are getting as many square inches of reading matter in their own paper as they do in the papers in Detroit or Chicago, they think they are not getting the worth of their money. It reminds us of the man who took the largest pair of boots in the box simply because they cost the same as the pair much smaller that fitted him.

SEE AND WASHBURN have a small store, but it is full. This firm are constantly increasing their stock and must, ere long increase their means of accommodating the public, as their popularity continues to grow.

The Cheboygan Free Press says: "Fears are entertained that all the logs now on the upper streams in this vicinity will be hung up unless we get rain. Among them Thompson Smith has about seven millions. On the Black river a dam is being constructed to flood them out."

Russia is having considerable trouble with the dissatisfied populations of her conquered territory. The people of Poland, the Tartars of the Crimea and the Circassians, are intensely dissatisfied with the rigor of Russian rule; and now that the Empire is at war most of their people think the occasion a favorable one for them to rise, and make a last endeavor to free themselves from a rule that has been obnoxious and severe. If the movement should become general among the disaffected people, it would require a large precentage of the Czar's army to keep peace at home, and thus would render the conquest to Turkey still more problematical.

FOURTH OF JuLY.

Shall We Celebrate Our Nations Birthday.

There will be a public meeting at the Town Hall, in the village of Charlevoix, on this (Tuesday) evening, to consider the question of appropriately celebrating the Fourth of July. It is desired to surpass any previous celebration held here, and the co-operation of adjoining Townships and villages is requested both in the preliminaries and subsequent demonstrations. Let there be a general attendance. By request of many citizens.

THE HARBOR WORK.

The Advertisement for Proposals Now in City Paper.

There now appears in the Chicago Inter-Ocean, Detroit Post, and Milwaukee Sentinel, the advertisement soliciting bids for work on the Charlevoix harbor under the provisions of the appropriation of 1876, of $10,000.

The Engineer will receive bids until noon of June 4th.

The specifications call for the construction of two cribs, without superstructure, 20x50, and ten feet deep, and dredging in channel 12,000 cubic yards more or less. Cribs will be placed in prolongation of the line selected for a south pier. The specifications stipulate that if funds will admit, a third crib may be constructed.

The requirements call for a good quality of hemlock, straight, free from whirls, rot, shakes, wanes, or other imperfections.

2,862 cubic feet of hemlock timber will be required for the cribs; also about 6,000 pounds of iron, in bolts, 124 cords of stone, and ten cords of brush.

The contractor must bind himself to commence the work on or before the first day of July, and to complete the same before the first of November 1877.

Printed specifications and instructions to bidders, together with blanks for bids, may be found at the SENTINEL office. Also a tracing of the crib work.

A RELIC OF THE PAST.—We received a call of F. Butler, Esq., of Dodge Co., Wis. Mr. Butler is grandfather to E. A. H. Cole of South Arm, and father to the widow of N. D. R. Cole, late of Intermediate Lake. Mr. Butler is 87 years of age. Having been born one year before the first congress, he has seen every administration of the American government. He was a soldier in the war of 1812, and relates incidents of that struggle which seem like dim echoes from by-gone ages. Mr. Butler has twelve grand-children, and about fifty great-grand-children. He tells us that in his youthful days wheat flour was unknown and others his longevity due to simple diet and steady habits. He walks with very slight dependence upon a very fine and neatly inscribed gold headed cane presented him by a Wisconsin congressman. He can with his rifle bring a squirrel from the tallest tree as well as he could fifty years ago. He reads without the aid of spectacles, and his voice is as sonorous as if his owner was in the full vigor of his forties. It was with a feeling of reverance that we gazed upon a man who was born before we were born, and whose lifetime has stretched over so many historical scenes in our country's history. Were the world less wicked we could wish that our years might equal his.

FUNERAL DISCOURSE TO ATTEND.—A circular has been issued from the office of the State Board of Health, declaring a public or church funeral of any person who has died of scarlet fever, diphtheria, measles or whooping cough dangerous to the lives of such as may attend, who have not had the disease, and requesting the family to limit the attendance to as few as possible, and prevent the presence of those who have not had the disease of which the person died. It also recommends that the room in which the person died and the clothing and bedding used during sickness be disinfected. The Board also advises the use of sealed wooden or metallic coffins, when the family can afford the expense.

For good dried beef go to See & Washburn's.

OUR NEW YORK LETTER.

New York, May 22, 1876.

To say that Nothing but the restrictions on Sunday last, would be telling a sort of a double barrelled truth, so far as the Carnival was concerned. The morning dawned as bright and balmy as ever upon the finest Mardi Gras of Naples. And everything was propitious for the holiday experiment which was the advertised intention of the managers to finally outgrow even the New York calendar. Anticipation, instead of the usual spread like somethingness epidemic, till it had touched even the most fastidious epidemic, till it had touched even the most sensitive of the nerves and gracious. Unlucky a very small proportion only of the subscribers had taken that the vocation that of what a Carnival is or should be, but all could understand the arrangement of procession, and everybody was on the street to see what fun the day would develop. Very large numbers came in from the neighboring region, and the cost, all told, was immense. It has been since asserted that on not two previous occasions in the history of the city—namely, at the time of Lincoln's funeral, and on the Centennial Fourth of July—have there been seen such street assemblages.

Of the carnival I have little to say further than that it was almost entirely composed of advertising wagons of storekeepers, bakers, and confectioners, sprinkled with brewers and gaily-tinted most immodestly the beer display in the trail, and, in fact, to say, showing fantasy was an enormous wheeled platform, or "float," in the language of the carnival, prepared by the Pond's Extract Company. Traveling upon this was a colossal patchwork bottle, which, could it have been filled, would have held enough of the well-known remedy to cure the aches of a nation. In front of the bottle sat a young girl in white, seeing in a fancy little boat drawn by swans while at the corners reclined four of the most perfect by made up from that ever inaugurated. These "grenadiers" could open and shut their big mouths and roll their great goggle eyes in a most startling and frightful manner, and as the float sailed slowly up the line of march, terrific applause kept even pace with it. This the float attracted audibly to themselves, tossing and kissing their webbed paws in the multitude with a thing gravity that was quite irresistible. One or two other concerns made feeble attempts to embody something of the proper spirit of the day, but they didn't succeed.

The evening display, thanks to the incompetency of the managers, was not much better. The allegorical floats were mostly either unsuable or poor—largely the latter. There was no discipline or order either among the dramatic personæ or the miscellaneous crowd of vehicles and pedestrians who filled and mingled with the regular procession. Inside of the richness of the fares no adequate provision of torches or other illumination had been made, and as every train dragged itself through its prescribed route amid melancholy darkness and the shouts of would-be spectators who called for something to the show by. The day and evening were unsatisfactory to all concerned, but the ball which wound up the outrageous celebration, was by far the best exhibition of imbecility of those who had it in charge. Gilmore's Garden had been covered with 30,000 square feet of dancing floor, two bands of music had been engaged, and vast quantities of champagne and other refreshment ordered. The failure that was made may be imagined from the fact, that probably not over a thousand people were in the building at any one time, and these almost exclusively passive spectators. The half dozen or so couples who ventured out into the desolate waste of floor, looked very much, to use a homely comparison, like flies in a pan of milk. This was continued till some time after midnight, when the languid struggle was given up and the Carnival stepped down and out.

Other amusements are drooping at the sudden approach of the summer season, which has held a hot hand over New York all the week.

Eastern Jugglers.

Convalescence is a capital time for odd amusements which will not tire the languid brain, and we had some jugglers up almost every day. We never could find out their tricks, which are very marvelous. Of course everybody has heard of the basket trick, where a small boy gets inside a basket, and the juggler plunges a sword through and through it, bringing it out reeking with blood, then hoists up the basket, shows that there's nothing there, and calls the boy, who calmly appears from outside the circle of spectators. And also the mango trick, where a seed is placed in the ground, is covered with a cloth, and appears as a shrub, growing visibly before one's very eyes, and then bears fruit, which ripens and is eaten in five minutes from first planting. These fellows have very scanty clothing, and, apparently, no apparatus whatever. There are some wise-acres who profess to know all about these tricks, I never saw the disembowelling and immediate healing of fakirs, in India, nor mere sitting in the air, "levitation," as Madame Blavatsky calls it. But I have seen other tricks as surprising, and especially unaccountable by any art or science with which Europeans or Americans appear to be acquainted now-a-days. I have seen a man throw up into the air a number of balls, one after another after him, with a drawn sword. In a few minutes down dropped cuts, a nose, a head and limbs of Number One; Number Two leisurely descends, wiping a bloody sword, shovels up the fragments of his victim into a box, and goes on with other performances, presently calling out for his defunct companion, who thereupon presents himself as large as life, all alive and kicking, from the ground. This is not a modern trick, but these I have seen are certainly not less marvelous.

Then, too, it is a well authenticated fact that some of these jugglers, on more than one occasion in recent years, have suffered themselves to be buried alive, and have been dug out alive after the lapse of a year. Something of this kind, according to a yarn I saw not long ago in some of the papers, is done by a tribe of Indians somewhere out in the great Northwest, who find, my winter always a season of hard times for them, economically make the most of their resources by saving up their children in air-tight bags, and keeping them all winter under the waters of the lake they live on, pulling them up in the spring all plump and hungry, like so many lyetanding dowsing or bears.—*Calcutta Cor. A Turkish Prison.

Opposite to the mosque with the six minarets, at Stamboul, there rises a gloomy building known as the Central Prison of the Ottoman Empire. Admission to it is formally denied to strangers, but no door can be consistent inexorably closed in Turkey to visitors familiar with the virtues of the Silver Key.

The fatal threshold being passed, circulation through the vast building is freely allowed, and also conversation with many of its inmates. There is not much to interest the visitors in the prison itself, the mirrors of former days having been put an end to, if they have not altogether ceased, being now, at least, very seldom, and always very secretly, resorted to, and the chains with which the prisoners were laden till lately fell at the request of the British Embassy Extraordinary at the time of the visit of Mr. Philip Currie, Lord Salisbury's First Secretary.

It is only the prisoners, or at least some of them, who appeal, if to not better feeling, at least to men's charity; and with these it is easy to be on friendly terms, as, although some of them may yes fumus be kept in secret, or doomed to solitary confinement, they are all allowed long hours of relaxation in the cortoirs, lobbies or passages, for the benefit of air and exercise, where a visitor, upon the slightest encouragement on his part, finds them extremely sociable and communicative. During those hours of promenade the dwellers of the various cells are thrown together pele mele, and, till custom has reconciled one to it, it is natural to be shocked by the sight of State prisoners, sometimes men of rank and education, having to struggle through the crowd of common felons and malefactors; the journalist Cassapo, for instance, or Kemal Bey, a literary man and a politician, elbowing past such monsters as Vassily, the coffee-house keeper, whose murder of the two sisters Samulik filled Pera with horror a year ago, or the Circassian, his accomplice, who, after the enjoyment of twelve months' imprisoning, has just been sent to keep him company after the trial in which he appeared as witness.

Hardly susceptible in the throng of common thieves, burglars and pickpockets there still linger here a few score of Bulgarians, mostly simple peasants and poor villagers, those who escaped the massacre and the first wholesale executions in that province, and who were arrested at hap-hazard, their guilt unknown to them as well as to those who apprehended them, and brought here, where no one ever heard their business, and where no one seems any longer to trouble himself about them. —London Times Pera Correspondence.

A Remarkable Dwarf.

Count Joseph Borowlaski was aptly termed "a perfect copy of Nature's finest works in Lilliputian." His intellect was remarkable, and was early developed. He spoke several languages. To soundness of understanding he combined quickness of apprehension and solidity of judgment. He soon acquired an elegance of deportment only obtained by intercourse with polished society. He was born in Chalfez, in 1739, and measured but eight inches at birth. He was exceedingly well-proportioned, and became a protege of Countess Humiska, a woman distinguished in her birth and personal accomplishments. She soon took him on a tour through the leading courts of Europe. He reached Vienna at the age of fifteen, and at that time was but twenty-five inches in height. He was presented to Maria Theresa, who became much attached to the great Princess was at the time at war with the King of Prussia. The Queen asked the dwarf's opinion of the Prussian monarch. "Madam," replied he, "I have not the honor to know him. Were I in his place, instead of waging a useless war against you, I would come to Vienna to pay my respects, thinking it more honor to gain your esteem than to gain a victory from you." The Queen took him in her lap and kissed him. He laughed. Queen Anne asked him what he was laughing at. His quick reply was: "I do not see so small a man on the lap of so great a woman." This answer procured him fresh caresses. He gazed at a ring on the hand of the Queen once when sitting on her lap, and she asked him if he thought it pretty. Borowlaski replied: "It was not the ring that I was looking at, but the hand I beseech your Majesty to kiss." This was granted, and the Queen took from her daughter a diamond ring and gave it to Borowlaski. The young lady from whose finger the ring was taken was the unfortunate Marie Antoinette, afterward Queen of France.

Maria Theresa used strenuous efforts to have the dwarf remain a member of her court, but countess Humiska would not consent to the arrangement.

When in Paris, Count Oliiski gave an entertainment to some ladies of high distinction, and to please them, he put Borowlaski into an urn. The urn was placed on the table, and a fancy dinner proceeded from it. The Count refused to uncover the urn, and the curiosity of the ladies was raised to the highest point. At length the cover was removed, and out sprang Borowlaski, who ran about the table to the no small astonishment and diversion of the ladies.

He visited various courts of Europe, and everywhere was he caressed by the ladies, and universally took him on their laps and kissed him.

At twenty-five he fell in love with an actress, and proposed to her; she laughed at him. At forty love again interfered to disturb his peace of mind. He married, shortly after, Isabella Barlo-Counton, and was turned adrift into the world by his former benefactress, Countess Humiska. He set out and gave concerts for the support of himself and his wife. A little daughter of one of the members of the nobility heard him sing, and asked her father to go buy the little man to her. When asked what she would do with him, replied: "I will keep him in my room and dress him like a doll."

Once, when the wife of Borowlaski was sick, he sent for Dr. Walker, who, seeing Borowlaski in the room, bade him keep quiet. It was with difficulty he was made to believe him a husband and a father. He had two children, and lived to the extreme age of ninety-eight.—John T. Foster.

MECHANICAL AND SCIENTIFIC.

—Mr. Worthington Smith, the discoverer of the true nature of the fungus which produces the potato-disease, has invented a mixture which he hopes will destroy the pest's.

—The most northerly telegraph-station in the world was established at Gjesvar, a Norwegian fishing-station, near the North Cape, in latitude 71 degrees 12 minutes north, on March 4th.

—A correspondent of the American Art Journal says that the girls of Cashmere make shawls worth $30,000, and will show three hundred distinct colors or shades which we cannot make, or even distinguish.

—In Sumatra, Jamaica, and some parts of India, the leaves of the coffee-plant are "cured" like tea-leaves, and used in the preparation of a beverage. The husks inclosing the coffee-berry are used for the same purpose in Arabia—a handful of the husks making about ten cups of coffee.

—A curious clock has recently been invented by M. Calsot, of Paris. It has two apparently dead hands placed in the center of a double plane, the two sheets of glass composing which are held in an ornamental frame. The clock is operated by concealed mechanism in the frame, which once a minute causes a slight and nearly invisible motion of one of the glasses. This causes the movement of the minute-hand, and a minute gearing concealed in the pivot of the latter actuates the hour-hand.

A late number of the Russian Review (St. Petersburg) contains an interesting paper on the wolf question in Russia. The number of wolves in that country is estimated at 200,000, annually costing the public at least 5,000,000 roubles. The author of a book on the subject advocates a grand universal effort to poison them off at the rate of fifteen roubles a head, and combats at length sundry objections to his proposal, one being the British one of the impossibility of laying poison for wolves without poisoning foxes. This public-spirited projector and author is an apothecary.

—English geologists have watched with great interest the progress of a well which has been bored for the benefit of a London Brewery, and which has just been successfully finished. At 120 feet the clays and gravels were passed, and the upper chalk began; from 400 to 842 feet the work lay through hard lower chalk and marl; at 840 feet, gault; at 1,004 feet the solid green-sand was reached below which water is already found. The work was done with a diamond drill. One crown of diamonds has cut 400 feet; but the strata have proved of very varied hardiness, and the flints in the chalk have occasionally delayed the speed of the work. When there was no mishaps the progress was fourteen or fifteen feet a day. The value of the diamond crown of the boring tool is about $500.

—People who take sulphur in spring and summer, after the time-honored method prescribed at Doctors' Hall, may be interested in the fact that the purity of their medicine is open to a doubt. Hands recently exhibited by his fellow-members of the San Francisco Microscopical Society specimens of the spurious and the genuine flowers of sulphur for comparison. The real article is obtained by subliming sulphur, and except that there is with it usually a little sulphurous acid, the product is almost chemically pure. But a great deal of what is sold as the sublimate now turns out, under the microscope, to be merely crude brimstone ground to a powder. Instead of "flowers" it should be called flour of sulphur. Of course the spurious article contains many impurities which make its use with treacle slightly matter.

—The Scientific American points out, giving figures which are seemingly careful, that in the event of a channel being opened into the great basin of the Sahara Desert certain disastrous results will follow. The surface to be flooded is on an average eighty feet below the surface of the sea, and, as the extent is near four million square miles, in flowing on the basin of one hundred and fifty millions for the entire ocean surface the general level will be lowered something like two feet. So much for the immediate result, but farther than this it is evident that if a sea which has practically no inflow or drain the water the loss from evaporation must be made good from the main ocean. This loss, according to the authority quoted, would amount to about 2,000,000,000,000,000 cubic feet annually, and the supply channel from the ocean would have to discharge about five hundred and twenty-five times as much water as is carried by the river Rhine. It is estimated that in a little more than a century the entire basin would be filled with salt, which would be but a poor substitute for the mud which now tempers the climate of Southern Europe.

A Unique Swindle.

There is a man residing in Eureka whose ambition and boast is that he can beat anybody's little game. Some time ago, when the small-pox scare was agitating the citizens of Pioche, our hero, who was in an impecunious condition, seedy, and broke, conceived and put into execution a stratagem that succeeded admirably in filling his pockets and adorning his back. Letting a confederate into his confidence—another of the same ilk—he procured a vial of carbolic oil, retired to his room, and, by repeated applications, brought out a first-class eruption on his face and body. The confederate reported the case, and he was immediately removed to the pest-house, and his chum, who kindly volunteered, appointed nurse at a salary of $10 per day. They were the only occupants of the institution, and managed to while away thirty days of enforced seclusion, with the aid of Sunday delicacies and a morish-ing diet. At the expiration of thirty days the nurse reported a complete cure of the sick man, and boasted that under and by reason of the strict attention paid by him to the patient, not a pit or scar marred his features. A new suit of clothes was provided for both, the $300 paid for attendance, and they left town on the next stage, boasting, when at a safe distance, of their smartness and talent in "beating the pest-house game."—*Eureka (Nev.) A Doctor's Love for a Fair Young Nun.

St. Fransiscus Hospital, a Catholic institution in this city, has recently been the scene of a very romantic occurrence. Some five or six months ago a young physician, a son of a prominent citizen of Pittsburgh, obtained the appointment of Assistant Physician to the hospital. As he is a Protestant some surprise was manifested, by those conversant with the facts, that he should be thus honored by a Catholic institution. He accepted no pay for his services, further than his board and an unlimited command of the splendid wines and liquors of the establishment, which are as abundant as they are good. Everything apparently ran along smoothly and pleasantly to all, until a short time ago, when an event transpired which has caused the young physician to sever his connection with the institution, the reason therefor being that he, while lying in the hospital were several nuns and Sisters of Mercy, who had taken vows of eternal celibacy. One of these, however, happened to be young, beautiful, intelligent and attractive, and the physician soon became deeply enamored of her. And notwithstanding her vows, the young nun soon returned the love in secret at another shrine than that of God, and Mary. In fact, her love for the fascinating young physician became as strong as his for her. In the daily ministration of hospital life they had frequent opportunities for speaking in that language which requires not words for utterances, and on one occasion, when Romeo prevailed upon the not unwilling Juliet to renounce her vows and flee with him, that ceremony was entered her ardent young life. So one bright morning, not more than a week ago, the fair recluse was not to be found; in the stillness of night she had stolen, without even so much as bidding her companions adieu. The Mother Superior of the establishment was naturally somewhat angry, and proceeded to make an investigation of the affair. As the result of her inquiries she accused the young physician of having assisted in the nun's escape. To her surprise he not only did not deny it, but openly acknowledged that he had opened the doors for the nun. And, further, he insisted that he had a perfect right to do so, as he was engaged to be married to her, and it was a foregone conclusion that he could not fulfil his contract if she retained the veil and a residence within the circumscribed limits of the hospital. The Mother Superior became exceedingly wroth, and infuroned the physician that his services would be dispensed with in the hospital. He received the announcement very coolly; and more than that, he told the irate lady that he had made preparations to go to Philadelphia, and so soon as he established there he intended to marry the fair nun whom he loved, admired and respected. The physician is but a little over nineteen years of age, but is said to be a young man of great promise in his profession.—Pittsburgh Chronicle.

She Meant Business.

Ah, Sam Woods sat contentedly in his easy chair, during the pleasant hours away. Business—well, the Magistrate rolled up his ears at the thought; not a decent case for two weeks. He was suddenly awakened by a clatter as of an army rushing up the office-stairs, then the door flew open, and a little stuffy woman, having in her a big six-footer of a countryman, waltzed in.

"I suppose you hitch persons up here?" spoke up the little woman, while the fellow gaped in open-mouthed dismay at the perfect sang-froid of his companion.

"Yes, if by hitching up you mean getting married," replied the astonished Magistrate.

"Come, John, step up like a little man until the Justice makes us one flesh," said the little woman, coolly; but John grew very red in the face, shuffled his feet uneasily; shifted his hands, started at the woman, then at the ceiling, and acted very unlike a happy prospective bridegroom.

The woman surveyed him carefully, her under lip became firmer, and a look of alertness lit up her eyes as she ironically said to the Magistrate: "You must not think hard of John, dear fellow; he always was timid and out of sorts when from the farm. Beside, I am older than he is, and have been married three times; but I am a lone widow now, all three died, and, when I saw John wanted a wife, I spoke to him, and we made up our minds to hitch—didn't we dear?"

"Wa'al, yes-ess, I 'spose so. If the Justice be willing," slowly stammered the bridegroom elect, coloring up fiercely.

"Now, take hold of hands and face me. No, not that way," said the Justice, as the fellow confusedly turned his back to the woman.

"I say, Judge, what be the charges for hitching up? Times be pesky hard——"

"Never mind his prattle, Judge; tie us up, and be quick about it, and I'll pay you," interrupted the woman, pulling a small United States Treasury Note from the folds of her dress.

"How much be there, Sally?" eagerly inquired John, his eyes lighting up like the headlight of a locomotive.

"Indeed, I shan't tell; it's all mine now;" and then, instantaneously, "but when we are married——"

"All right, Judge; tie us up as fast as the law will let you; we're ready," broke in John, excitedly.

In three minutes, city time, the twain were made one. As they were going down the stairs the breezes wafted to the ears of the Magistrate these words: "Now, Sally, how 'bout that 'ere money."—Erie Dispatch.

By Gov. Bagley, is reported as having been in critical health for some time past.

Samuel J. Tilden and all the Democratic State officials of New York were invited to attend the New York Chamber of Commerce banquet the other day but they all declined the invitation because President Hayes was also invited and accepted the invitation. But the digestion of the New York merchants was not affected by this bit of childish spite, and the reception of President Hayes was a complete ovation.

Respecting the appointment of a successor to Judge Emmons in the Sixth Judicial Circuit the Milwaukee Sentinel says: "Of the four gentlemen named we believe that Mr. Christiancy possesses the most conspicuous claims, having served with great distinction as Judge of the Supreme Court of Michigan and if his appointment should open the way for Mr. Chandler to re-enter the Senate, a statesman would be restored to that body who has done the country noble service there."

About the return of good times, the Chicago Journal expresses the conviction, not only that the depression has reached hard pan or bed rock, from which the bubbles, up will be below but sure, but that the "games of chance" are played out, and every man must henceforth earn his own prosperity by hard off-ort, for he will not be able to do it by luck. The sooner everybody—especially the great army of hoping and do-nothing adven urers and speculators—shall see, understand and act upon this stubborn and indubitable fact, the better for themselves and the public generally.

The glittering gem in Jeff. Davis' recent speech at Mobile was in the middle passage. He said: "Though the silver lining of the cloud be not fairly discernible, yet be not dismayed. But that I need not say to men who never felt any other fear than that of doing wrong. Then let me say rather, 'Be not without hope.' The cause for which you struggled was that of justice and of truth. The triumphs of these may be postponed, but in the ordering of Providence must come at last. Your motives must be appreciated, sooner or later, for your sacrifices were made for Constitutional liberty."

CIRCUS.—The Great Australian Circus showed in this village on Saturday. It was the greatest circus on earth—so the bills said). They traveled on a steam barge, had a very fair band, which paraded our streets in a somewhat gorgeous chariot drawn by ten horses, clad (the band we mean) in red calico coats and tin helmets. They succeeded in taking two or three hundred dollars out of the country that should have been spent for bread, pork and newspapers.

FOURTH OF JULY.—At the meeting on Tuesday evening to discuss the 4th of July question considerable discord was manifest on the land question principally because that organization saw fit to set their own price on their services for the fourth. They are open for an engagement anywhere within a reasonable distance of Charlevoix. In the meantime, we presume the celebration will come off in Charlevoix the same as if nothing had happened. And we wish to add, that the land own their own horns, and are their own little milch.

THE Legislature adjourned sine die on the 18th. The tax bill as amended by the Senate was finally lost, the House not agreeing to the amendments. Senator Williams made an able and exhaustive argument on this question, favoring the appointment of a commission to settle the question. Mr. Williams showed himself thoroughly posted in this, as in every other matter he has taken in hand during the session. Among the bills lost during the last hours was that attaching Manitou to Charlevoix county.

The Burial Place of Marquette.

The Cheboygan Free Press of May 19 published the following items:

"Like wildfire the news spread throughout the village this week that the foundation of the old Jesuit Mission which was established by Father Marquette 200 years ago had been discovered on the farm of Mr. David Murry, at Pointe St. Ignace, and that numerous church relics of those days had been unearthed, showing beyond question that this was the place where the Mission was erected. Soon after this news was received the inquiries at the telegraph office announced the fact that the bones of a human being had been found on the grounds which were undoubtedly the remains of that intrepid missionary, Father Marquette. As the readers of the early history of Michigan are aware, in 1671 Father Marquette built a log chapel at Point St. Ignance, and named the station St. Ignatius. After this a church was erected which was subsequently destroyed by fire and all trace of its location was lost. Efforts have been made at different times to discover the site of the old mission, but heretofore they have been of no avail. On the farm of Mr. Murry, about 200 feet from the main road running through the town there is a small rise of ground covered over with thick underbrush, which had not been cleared away. It was here that Mr. Patrick Murry, son of David Murry one day last week made the important discovery of the location of the old church. The foundation, marked by a rise of ground somewhat in the shape of a cross, is clearly traced as well as the location of the baptismal font and the place where the church treasures were kept. As soon as the fact was made known of the discovery, many people gathered on the ground, and in the researches that were made was found a number of ancient church relics, such as gold pieces, portions of crosses, window glass, etc. It is reported also that a cross has been found with Father Marquette's name upon it. There is much excitement at the Pointe in regard to the matter, and a guard is now on duty to protect the place from intrusion until some definite plan of action shall be determined upon by the proper authorities. A rumor is current, with how much truth in it we cannot tell, that large rewards have been offered for the discovery of the old mission site or of the remains of Father Marquette. History tells us that he died in the vicinity of where now stands the city of Grand Rapids, and was there buried, but that his bones were subsequently taken up and placed in a vault in the church founded by him at the Pointe. The statements in regard to the recent discoveries were furnished us by different ones, and we give them as reported."

Pere Marquette is well known as among the most conspicuous of the Jesuit missionaries who were the pioneers of the French settlements which were the first durable results of the penetration of the whites into that portion of the Northwest. Of these missionaries as a class Judge Campbell says (page 18 "Political History of Michigan"): "We are indebted to some of them, of whom Marquette is a noble example, for great services in exploring the country and accurate geographical information. They were second to none in their contributions to geographical knowledge in both hemispheres, and as remarkable for courage and persistance as for scientific research." Marquette did not die near Grand Rapids, as suggested by the Cheboygan paper, but at the site of the present city of Ludington, on the river which bears his name with its priestly title. That there is ground for the belief that his remains may have been discovered at Pointe St. Ignance will be evident from the extract from Judge Campbell's history (p. 13 18): "The mission at the Sault de Ste. Marie was founded by Marquette in 1668. The same year or the next a mission was founded on the island of Michilimackinac, but removed very soon, and as early as 1669 or 1670, to Pointe St. Ignace, on the mainland north of the Straits of Mackinac and west of the island. * * * The establishment was afterward (but when is not exactly known from published authorities) transferred to the northern point of the Lower Peninsula of Michigan, not far from Cheboygan. In Charlevoix's time (1721) the old mission was abandoned and had fallen into decay. * * The determination of its precise location has been attended with some difficulty. It derives interest from the fact that the remains of Pere Marquette, some years after his death, were removed by the Indians from the place of his first burial, and interred at the church of Point St. Ignace." The possibility even that the resting place of Marquette's remains has been at last discovered will arouse the interest of all who are acquainted, even though it be but superficially, with the early history of the Great Lakes.

OUR TRIP.—For the first time in our life we have trod the pavements of the great Chicago—have traversed the miles that were laid waste by flame, and while ashes were yet warm rebuilt again with more than its former grandeur. Scarcely a reader of the SENTINEL but has seen more than we have of Chicago and we shall not attempt to describe it, but our time was well spent in visiting all the principal points of interest, from the ponderous yet beautiful waterworks, whose famous tunnel eclipses that of Monte Cenis, to the mammoth houses of Field Leiter & Co. By this way, in the wholesale house of this firm we found our old friend Dan Hill in charge of the silk department. This firm do a wholesale business of $28,000,000 per annum. We visited McVicker's, the great theatre of the West, and Col. Wood's Museum, abounding in natural curiosities.

We were seven hours at Milwaukee, and behind the fast rig of the Starke Brothers saw the greater portion of the Cream City. It is a beautiful town full of good people, fine buildings, and palatial residences.

The propeller Fountain City carried us to and fro, and we were fortunate in selecting a boat so noted for good treatment, and rapid transit. Capt. Gibson and his officers are ideal gentlemen.

The cheapest place in town to buy clothing is at See & Washburn's.

THE LIQUOR LAW.—The new liquor law passed by the Legislature, and which took immediate effect, makes it unlawful for any person to sell, furnish, or give spiritous or intoxicating liquor to persons in the habit of getting intoxicated. All saloons and restaurants shall be closed on Sundays, and on weekdays from 10 p. m. to 5 a. m., except in cities and incorporated villages where they are permitted to remain open not later than 11 p. m. A penalty is inflicted upon persons who obtain liquor by false pretenses. The law gives a right of action to wife, child, parent or guardian against the sellers of liquors to an intoxicated person who inflicts an injury upon them. The dealer is not permitted to sell liquor at all to Indians or persons of Indian descent. We understand also that the dealers are compelled to pay the full amount of their tax at once.

Bed steads and chairs of all style at Fox, Rose & Buttars.

STILL the war remains indecisive and unimportant. The most significant intelligence of the last twenty-four hours is that Russia, Germany and Austria have come to an understanding by which the war is to be localized. This, if it is well-founded, means that Austria and Germany have determined not to interfere, and that, therefore the war will be confined to Russia and Turkey, as England will not venture to take part without co-operation with some other power. From Asia comes the news that Mukhtar Pasha is falling back upon Erzeroum, and at the same time is assuring the malcontents at Constantinople that he has in execution a scheme "certain to secure success," and begs to be left alone. This reminds one of the Confederate exultation, as they lost post after pos, upon the ground that these losses "enabled them to concentrate their resources." If Mukhtar Pasha has in reality fallen back upon Erzeroum, the Russian campaign in Asia has been more than half won already. From the Danube we have nothing but continued notes of preparation. Servia seems to be drifting into the fight, and the Russian passage of the Danube will probably be followed by a Servian declaration of war against Turkey. Events seem to be hurrying Greece into a similar attitude, despite the reluctance of the ministry. From Constantinople comes a rumor that the Sultan intends to abdicate, but it is not probable.

Plenty of pork, flour, smoked meats and oats at Fox, Rose & Buttars.

OUR NEW YORK LETTER.

New York, June 1, 1877.

It was a most unseasonable March wind that came blowing into the city on the 31st of May, carrying overcoat, muff up to the ears, and burning the bosoms of straw hat and "flimsy" wearers, we know that the summer season is upon us. We were not prepared for this sudden and unwelcome change, but at the same time we are glad of it. Numerous men who took off all their thick things at the first warm breath and thus came near losing the pneumonia by the merciful intervention of Providence, are now pretty well through the threatened peril, and shame has played them many a trick for the last two or fifty years, according to their various ages. We know it by more than one symptom and certificate in our sanctum. It is not that the grass is long and each tree a most enticing grove, nor that we who live in the suburbs and have gardens welcome the gold purple hue as he saunters sunwardly in the walk, or quarrel hotly with our next door neighbor as to whose corn is tall an inch the higher. No, such signs as these are well enough in their way, but they cannot compare for accuracy with the reappearance of the soda water man. All winter long this estimable member of society is nowhere, to all intents and purposes. From the afternoon of his disappearance I am tempted to believe that at the first snow squall he curls up in some hollow tree, pats his paws in his mouth, and lies dormant like my excellent friend the black bear. His great forepaw fountain is bundled up and for many months is frustrated with snow or blown bare and clean by ice which shake the very thought of soda water a source of unstoppable suggestion. But at length, some time after those little arid corals, the birds, get back from their winter residence in Florida, the soda water man unearths himself, gets out of his tree, struts around in his stand, casts his weather eye around the firmament and finally at his good pleasure unfastens his apparatus and rolls up his sleeves. That settles it. We are keen at the commencement of our summer season, and may safely get out our four-in-hands, fix up our cottages at Long Branch and and Newport, and get ready for business generally.

Of course in speaking of the soda water man I do not mean the vendor of that one refreshment exclusively. Some of him sell ginger beer; others dispense the various mineral mud. I take him to represent the purveyors of any cool beverage that stings when it goes down, and immediately comes tingling back into the nose, making that organ feel and look like a pin cushion, causing the eyes to weep and the whole being to wail, for the moment that it had never been born.

Emboldened by so illustrious an example other regular commercialities are making their appearance. The magnificent excursion steamers in which New York is rich have thrown off tarpaulin coverings and misty loneliness, and commenced to blow hot breaths from their big black nostrils, as they rush to and from half a score of suburban resorts. The parks fill and the lattery is crowded. The yacht clubs and associations show signs of active life. Gilmore's Garden, after passing through six months of vicissitude at rink, race course, circus, dog show and ball room, has thrown off all commercial considerations, disinfected itself from dust and carnival, and fitted itself back into its normal position as the promenade concerts garden of the country. The managers have put in $5000 worth of turf, gravel, fountain and flowers, and Gilmore himself, having drilled his band within an inch of its life mounted the stand for the first time this year on the evening of the 24th.

The stringent law against gambling, passed at Albany just before the opening of the sporting season, threw the New York pool sellers and their numerous patrons into a sort of belligerant despair. Elections, ball matches, races, etc., without betting, seem to them like the play of Hamlet with the melancholy prince omitted. After considerable cogitation the difficulty was partly got over by the removal of the pugilist pool rooms to the more hospitable shores of New Jersey, where sports of high and low degree can wager their spare cash on the success of their favorites. The principal obstacle now found in rules and larges filled up for use in this emergency, and mustered around Abandoned wharfs in Hoboken. Such is the strength of the ruling passion.

The steamer Wisconsin of the same line as the ill-fated Dakota, which was wrecked on the Welch coast a short time ago, has just come in, bringing the latter's three hundred passengers, without mishap, baggage and almost their livery to their southern destination. Among those passengers were two women who were being brought over on slave purposes, and who literally danced for joy at being rescued. Another passenger was Henry the champion pedestrian, who has been walking for some months in England and Ireland, and now comes home heavy to charge with glory and trophies. He claims to have been hindered by the nobility in his friend's council, and to prove it he and Brannyes dismissed ring, a silver tea service and other marks of the traditional British respect to physical prowess.

The Charley B. excitement has been serenely revived by the return to America of the steamer by P. T. Barnum. Barnum believes the fund to be in Paris, and has made an agreement with the holder of the bag to offer a reward of $10,000 to be paid by himself, and as questioned asked for the return of the missing youth. Should the next attempt prove successful Mr. Rose is to have the option of repaying the $10,000 to Barnum or allowing the latter to exhibit the bag—who would certainly be one of the most drawing attractions the great showman ever took on—until he pays himself from the profits of the strange speculation. It is a business arrangement, on Barnum's part, but still it is a piece of kindness, for Mr. Rose has spent his entire fortune in the search, and has no more means to prosecute it.

Here is another of those queer freaks of fortune which occasionally make for themselves a ripple even on the restless sea of New York life. News came to a number of residents of Brooklyn and vicinity a short time since, that they were heirs to a fund which has been accumulating in the Bank of England for nearly seventy years, and now amounts to nearly twelve millions of dollars in hard cash. As the recipients of this intelligence are all in very moderate circumstances the accession promised among them by this Arabian Nights sort of information may be imagined. It seems that one Robert Shepherd in 1810 placed the fund which was the nucleus of this mammoth fortune in the Bank of England to the credit of a sister. Her elopement caused an estrangement between them which lasted some years, and all his subsequent efforts to find her were unsuccessful. At his death, heirs to himself or sister were advertised for, but none appeared, and the money has remained untouched till now. What lucky accident threw the club to these Brooklynites in the way of the public administrator in England is not known. As it is every person of the name of Shepherd for a hundred miles around is picking up his ears and lick ing his lips in hopes of getting a slice of this fat inheritance. It is very much to be feared that had this taken place in this country some one would have managed to get his hands on a treasure of this size which had begging for such a length of time.

OUR RUBIES.

We are so rich—my heart and I—
We sigh—my sweet, though oft we try,
The various incomes grand and fair,
In which we hold perpetual share.

Our happy fortune is begun
Each morn, when comes the gracious sun,
Scattering, with golden largess round,
Earth seen at once enchanted ground.

Then all the splendors of the night
Are ours, by long-established right;
From silver moon and star-gemmed sky,
For gems on years, my heart and I
Have had a frequent eye.
That caught could boast of dearer delight.

Then, too, we have the world of flowers;
The songs of birds in woodland bowers;
The sparkling rivers that, to and fro,
Breathe words we can alone know,
And sound shoals and varying rows,
And murmured hills and azure seas—
Power many treasures, good for fate,
That time cannot waste or destroy;
Thus earned wealth of earth and sky
We freely share—my heart and I.

Then we have riches greater still,
That all our days with gladness fill—
Accents that cheer and scenes that bless,
And glorious truths to live and die;
And gentle words from lips we love,
And looks of kindness that dwell above
That fond like natures still have left
Here—in this sin-encumbered earth.

And we have memories—oh, how dear!
That gone moon precious year by year
Memories of loved ones passed away,
Whose tender teachings with us stay
And give us daily strength to bear
For life and heaven all that share,
As some must and left thus cold,
To say in many words untold
Unexpressed because softly by
Eyes only—ne'er—my heart and I.

Yet, though so richly—my heart and I—
Our portion of wealth to testify
Can thanks to that benignant Power
Who gave as such a glorious dower,
Ah, yes! all words are poor and weak
Our grateful, earnest love to speak;
But let us fondest hope that blooms
Have what it breathes soft perfumes—
To life none add before it dies,
Though none be near to drink its sighs;
And, as into smallest swallowed boat
Is by a lord impulse stirred
To send its song of rapture round,
Though never mortal hear the sound,
So sing my heart and I—as they
The Lord of Song call obey
And though our effort may be vain,
Though none may listened our fond deeds praise,
We yet must sing, and, singing, try
To speak our gladness in our lays.

PASSE.

Mr. Erskine was an idler that summer, as well as a stranger, in the pleasant town of Brierthorpe. Just up from a typhoid fever, the doctor had ordered him to take his ease and forget business. Mr. Erskine was a single gentleman—by that token Brierthorpe was not slow to discover. He was not without "means," the gossips intimated significantly, and he possessed a fine figure and a comely countenance, with manners so genial and polished as to be irresistible. Satirically the first remarked, it was sufficient to make the acquaintance of a gentleman so attractive, especially as young men were not abundant and the supply of marriageable daughters greater than the demand. But they were anxious to show him the civilities customary to strangers within their gates, of course not with the remotest idea, we know, of throwing Florence Ann or Ruth Ellen at his very prominent head. And what the first families had a mind to do, that they speedily accomplished. The Misses Brierthorpe, having gone out to row in a leaky boat, managed to come to grief one afternoon in Mr. Erskine's neighborhood, where he was varying the solitude by fishing and sketching by turns, with his wherry anchored near. He made haste to go to their assistance, to be sure, as their boat, having met a steep tooth of the hidden rocks, threatened to capsize. He took them into his own craft, admirably with pleasure at the success of their stratagem, and he rowed them against the tide to the border of the paternal acres. The young ladies were rendered mute by the emotion called gratitude. "Papa would be so glad to make the gentleman's acquaintance; their preserver would always be remembered; would he give them his card and address, that papa might call and thank him?" and so forth and so on.

Mr. Erskine was not sorry that a romantic episode had arrived to vary the monotony of his retirement. The young ladies were pretty, and spoke with the accent of cultivated people, and wore the fashions of good society; and how was he to know that the years of books and the middle-aged mediocrity at a boarding-house. He felt a natural craving for society. Papa Brierthorpe called and did the affable thing, and invited the young hero to his house; and before the week ended Brierthorpe rang with the report that Mr. Erskine had rescued Miss Linda from a watery grave at the risk of his life, and was on such intimate terms with the family that the usual dénouement was imminent. This, however, was not exactly the case. It is true that Mr. Erskine became a favorite at home in the Hardacre mansion; that he rowed and drove with the girls, especially with Miss Linda, that he loaned her to sketch a little, and spent a good deal of his leisure on their crippled pony; that he danced more frequently with her than with the other young ladies to whom the force of circumstances and society had obliged the Misses Hardacre to introduce him; that he walked in the moonlight with Miss Linda—that reason so conducive to lunacy—and had the general air of having been smitten by her charms, as well as Brierthorpe could interpret it.

"I wonder," said he one evening, "if you know a Miss Laura Loring who lives in this neighborhood somewhere?" It was the night of Mrs. Gore's garden party, and they were loitering in the Pane Grove, through which the Chinese lanterns shed a light as gorgeous as that reflected from painted windows, while the band discoursed some melancholy dance music from some hidden nook, and gay couples were passing and repassing on their way to and from the house, where refreshments and waltzing were enjoyed. "A friend of mine writes me that she is worth cultivating," he pursued. "You will find Loring's Folly; and, crawling through a tangled thicket, his title discharged itself into his side. Somebody gallantly seized him in the confusion to listen to the reverberations of the report, which seemed prolonged far up the wooded height, and then ventriloquized, saying, 'Echo, sweet echo, with thee let me die,'" till suddenly the delicate golden glow succeeded by a cry of fear, as she approached the prostrate figure of Mr. Erskine. That gentleman was naturally insensible when he was taken up by some of the lady sentinels and carried to the nearest dwelling. He was never himself conscious, throughout the whole night, to wonder why he was lying there helpless, why there were unfamiliar faces about him; but by the following morning that shadowy region that lies between the out, or had meant to go out, shooting —or had he dreamed it? Then he overslept himself; for at the reception sky was full of no early light. Then he let his glance escape from the diamond-shaped panes of the casement windows to the great mirror with its remnant of gilding, to the quaintly carved chairs with the cushions that had once been gay, to the wide fireside with its glittering dogs, behind which a handful of embers glowed, and back to the bed upon which he lay, with its high, curiously wrought posts and its hangings of faded buster. Had he been lured away into some enchanted prison? And was that a woman, or some cunning piece of sculpture, in the big armchair?—a woman fallen asleep as if after long vigils, with her dimpled chin upon her hand—a very fair woman, he thought, with a mobile mouth, and a shadow beneath the closed eyes, cast, perhaps, by the long brown lashes; and maybe a fine too pale and worn for rose; but a very fair woman for all that—and how unlike Miss Linda! And then he essayed to lift himself up, and a sharp pain drew him back, and he fell into a deep and sleeping hazily in the antique chair came to life with a start and a shiver; and just at that instant the door opened softly, and a medical gentleman entered. Mr. Erskine must have experienced some sensations similar to those of Sigismund, to Calderon's romance of "Life's a Dream," when he wakened in "sumptuous palaces." Not that there was anything like the magnificence of luxury in this new situation: the linen upon which he lay was coarse, the counterpane was home-made, patched; everything was dim and worn with age and use; everything except the apparition in the arm-chair, with its deep sweep of snowy linen waving straight into his.

"And how fares our patient this morning?" said the new visitor.

"He has been very quiet since you left him. But perhaps he can speak for himself. I think I had dropped asleep."

"You are not used to vigils, little girl; you are pale yourself. Ah!"—turning to Mr. Erskine—"our patient looks as if he would like to ask questions. So, so, but not to-day—not to-day; they'll keep."

That was no tedious convalescence of Mrs. Erskine's in the quaint old room, into which the sunset stole, rosy, red and gold, and touched the faded roses of the chintz into a moment's youth, and lent a magic light to the soft eyes watching beside him. What a tender hand was this which smoothed his pillow or bathed his aching head! how deftly, after the breakfast, the touch of a blind nurse! And what a tuneful voice was this that read from the poet and the novelist, and filled their pages with new revelations! What delicious twilights were those, when the young moon glanced in through the casements unnoticed, and they let their fancies wander into the future, betrayed by its beauty, and told each other "fairy tales of science," and grew confidential and personal, and found that they loved the same creeds, and often antipathized each on the thoughts! When he had first been allowed the privilege of speech, "I should be happy to know all about it," he said. "It is now in the days of witchcraft, and should believe myself under some enchantment. At least, I should like to know why it is that works these spells."

"I am Laura Loring," she said, smiling; "and you are just as wise as you were before."

"You are an angel, whoever you are."

"Nobody ever calls me one. Perhaps you are premature; you don't know me well enough."

"Don't know you! Doesn't a sick-room reveal character? Don't I know you! I believe I knew you when you were a star in the constellation of Cassiopeia and I was a nebulous point in the heavens—"

"Hush! I'm afraid you are wandering again."

"Not far away from here, I trust. And so you are Laura Loring! Well, I hoped to make your acquaintance sooner or later, but hardly expected to bring it about in this way. A gunshot wound is an ugly affair, but every thing has its compensations. And so you are Laura Loring!" he repeated, smiling quietly.

"Did you suppose I was anyone else?"

"I never supposed you were Laura Loring. I once asked Miss Linda Hardacre about you, and her description was quite different."

"Indeed? I dare say she flattered the portrait. I believe Miss Hardacre is imaginative."

"She certainly drew on her imagination in this instance." "And so this is Miss Linda's passe Miss Loring," he thought. "For accurate information recommend me to Miss Hardacre. She ought to cultivate such expert sciences, with such a taste for them."

The day arrived when he could walk in the garden with the assistance of Miss Laura. The red leaf had come, the grapes were growing incant and purple against the sunny wall, the ripening apples were dropping faint by faint, and gay, autumnal glories encumbered the garden borders, and the asters were crowned that indefinable sweetness which we call melancholy.

"I could almost wish to be an invalid forever, and walk these pleasant garden alleys alone with you," he said. "By-the-way, if that lucky shot had ended my existence, very likely the world have called it suicide because Miss Hardacre refused me." They walked on together in silence for a little space. "Have you ever let me ask me if she did?" he persisted.

"Because it is none of my affair."

"Oh, isn't it? Do you know I must have seen you somewhere in some previous state, if not in this?"

"Yes; you saw me; or, rather, I saw you, at Mrs. Gore's garden party. You were walking with Miss Hardacre, in the grove, and Mr. Vane said it looked like a match, and I turned to see what it could resemble, and saw you."

"I remember. We had just been speaking of you, as aforesaid. Miss Hardacre had been trying to paint the lily, and had made a wretched daub of it. She was in high spirits, with her dimpled chin upon her hand—a very fair woman, he thought, with a mobile mouth, and a shadow beneath the closed eyes, cast, perhaps, by the long brown lashes; and maybe a fine too pale and worn for rose; but a very fair woman for all that—and how unlike Miss Linda! Mr. Erskine had drawn nearer while she spoke, and now, taking her hand, he said, "I shall do no such thing: I prefer to be happy myself. I love you. And as for poor Jack, he will never trouble us. He was the last man left clinging to the raft when we sighted it on our way home the year I was supercargo: we thought he was in a stupor when we took him off, but it was death. We dished knew where or to whom he belonged; he had no papers or anything to show about him, but 'Jack Loring' was tattooed upon his arm. I have not thought of him for years, poor fellow: and as for the name, there are Lorings and Lorings in my part of the world. Do you still think I had better go to Miss Hardacre?"

"I hope it will not break her heart," said Laura, with tears in her eyes.

And Miss Linda only learned that her pale girl was a widow when she read the marriage of Mr. Clarence Erskine to Mrs. Laura Loring in the Brierthorpe Tattler.—Harper's Bazar.

The First Napoleon's Idea of the Value of Newspapers.

In the ninth volume of the Napoleon correspondence, recently published, there is a curious letter addressed from Paris to Champagny, Duke of Cadore, then Minister of Police. It is dated "Chateau de Surville, 16 Fev., 1814," and written in a spirit of bitterness and despondency still to animate Oriental art; military potentates. "The newspapers," His Majesty is pleased to say, "are edited without any intelligence. Is it rational, in the present state of affairs, to say that I had very few men, that I conquered because I surprised the enemy, and that we were one against three? You must indeed have lost your heads in Paris to say such things when I am saying everywhere that I have 300,000 men, when the enemy believes it, and when it must be repeated again and again. I had formed a bureau for the direction of journals, does it never occur to you that I have some milk beat one tablespoonful of butter, two tablespoonfuls of molasses, and rye flour enough to make a stiff batter; add one even teaspoonful of soda dissolved in one tablespoonful of boiling water and drop from a spoon into a hot greased muffin pans or in balls on a large pan and bake in a quick oven. Or, into two cupfuls of sour

False Impression.

It is generally supposed by a certain class of citizens, who are not practical or experienced, that Dyspepsia can not invariably be cured, but we are pleased to say that ANGIER'S AROMA PYRETICA has never, to our knowledge, failed to cure Dyspepsia and Liver Complaint in all its forms, such as Sour Stomach, Costiveness, Sick Headache, palpitation of the heart, low spirits, &c., &c. Out of 50,000 dozen bottles sold last year, not a single failure was reported, but thousands of complimentary letters received from Druggists of wonderful cures. Three doses will relieve any case. Try it. Sample Bottles 10 cents. Regular Size 75 cents. For sale by.

After deciding to meet next year at Kalamazoo, the following officers were elected: President Ralph Ely; Vice-Presidents, Lieut. Davenport, of the Navy, William M. Ruffle, R. P. Robbins, W. W. Van Antwerp, W. H. Maston, B. S. Pease, L. L. Spaulding, B. W. Huston, R. F. Partridge and C. H. Grant; Recording Secretary, V. W. Bruce; Corresponding Secretary, Le Roy Phillips; Treasurer, W. B. McCreery. Executive Committee, Dwight May, Robert Burns, S. E. Matthews, L. W. Heath and J. A. McKnight.

THIEVES entered the St. James Catholic Church, in Grand Rapids, on the night of the 25th, and carried off the two silverums, the ostensorium and the lavabo, from the sacristy, in the altar. The four pieces were of silver and gold, and cost about $300.

THE lumber-camp at Chelsea, Kalkaska County, comprising over ten hundred men and a large quantity of manufactured lumber, was burned on the 24th. A dispatch was received on the afternoon of that day, just before the wires gave out, that a pile of lumber containing 3,000,000 feet was burning, with no prospect of saving a dollar's worth. The loss is from $50,000 to $60,000. The mills were stocked by Bernhard Carpenhard & Co., of Grand Rapids.

A FEW days ago, two brothers, named Clem and Mat McDermid, living at Pine River, while on their way home from Midland, got into an altercation, during which Clem drew a knife, and Mat, seeing the weapon, ran. No other was in sight, so Clem, it is supposed, threw the knife at his brother, striking him between the shoulders, the point coming out through the breast-bone. Mat fell dead in his tracks. Clem then walked up to his brother, drew the knife from the body, and then walked on to Midland and gave himself up to the officers.

THE Democratic State Central Committee of Ohio have decided to hold the next State Convention at Columbus, on the 25th of July.

Fashionable Smuggling.

A GRAND Bracket of time smuggling outfits for gentlemen, and a general quantity of feminine wear, from the Liverpool ship Isaac Webb, has directed attention to the practice among the leaders of fashion in this city of apparelling themselves in contraband English-made suits of the latest pattern. Finding for the smuggling of these goods has existed for a long time, but it is only recently that it has been exposed to the public gaze. The method of the Ring is composed of London and Liverpool tailors, officers of steamships and the wearers of the goods in this city. The great inducement to the latter class is the saving of the 50 per cent. ad valorem duty that is required on imported clothing. For instance, promenade suits of the most fashionable styles, with silk and satin linings and facings, for which New York tailors would be compelled to charge from $80 to $100, could be smuggled and delivered to customers here by steamship officers employed by the London and Liverpool tailors for between $40 and $50. Business suits that could not be made in Broadway for less than $50 and $60, could be got here from the Ring for $25 and $30.

The Government has not been the only loser by the operations of the smugglers and their well-to-do patrons here, but fashionable New York tailors have been unable to compete with the English clothiers, and have suffered a loss of custom. Of late the operations of the smugglers have been carried on so extensively that many small importing tailors have had their business ruined. One of the sufferers is an English clothier in Broadway, who imports goods in large quantities. Forty years ago he was caught undervaluing his goods. He was indicted in a large sum, and since then he has scrutinized with customs' laws with scrupulous nicety. He has had large number of customers within the last few months, and on making inquiries he found that his trade had been captured by a prominent London tailor. He was then advised by the Collector to follow marauders into Mexico and punish them upon that territory.

The next Pennsylvania Republican State Convention is to be held at Harrisburg on the 20th of August.

THE Governor of Illinois has vetoed the bills passed by the last Legislature, making silver coins a legal tender for the payment of debts in the State.

A WASHINGTON dispatch of the 31st ult. says the representations on the subject of the Chisholm massacre had been referred to Atty.-Gen. Devens, who would examine the laws for the purpose of ascertaining whether there is any authority for the Federal Courts to interfere. The Secretary of State would take part in the investigation only from the fact that the British authorities consider Commissioner, Dwight May, Robert Burns, S. E. Matthews, L. W. Heath and J. A. McKnight.

THE Democratic State Central Committee of Ohio have decided to hold the next State Convention at Columbus, on the 25th of July.

OUR NEW YORK LETTER.

New York, June 8, 1877.

The ceremonies of Decoration Day, which enjoyed never largest yet observance, Dr. consideration the weather, were the most successful ever observed heathenism. Cemeteries were crowded with people, and the processions of the Grand Army of the Republic, with their escorts, were never so large and imposing. The military display, which extended from Fifth avenue to the Battery, and from Washington Parade Ground to Union Square, was witnessed by thousands of persons, who lined the sidewalks and filled the windows and roofs of the houses. Many of the veterans who marched in the procession were accompanied by their wives and children, and the whole affair was a most inspiring exhibition of patriotism. The day was also observed by the Democratic Young Men's Association, which had a procession and a picnic at Jones' Wood. The Democratic Young Men's Association is a new organization, which was formed last winter with the object of bringing the young men of the party into closer relations with each other, and thereby increasing the party's influence. The picnic was a success in every way, and was largely attended. The display at Washington Parade was the largest the Democracy have ever made in this city. Senator Morton's Letter on the Southern Question.

INDIANAPOLIS, Ind., May 21.

Senator Morton, in reply to an open letter in the New York Times and to numerous private letters, has addressed a long letter to the ——— journal, which is condensed below.

He says that when the credentials of Wm. Pitt Kellogg were presented to the Senate in December last, and to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, which Committee he was then a member, through the Republican Senators were prepared to report favorably in favor of Louisiana, and that he (Senator Morton) was, therefore, compelled to go into a consideration of the credentials of Kellogg as closely as if a majority of the Republican Senators were opposed to him. He says he spoke that Kellogg was lawfully elected, he had no hesitation in saying that his seat, notwithstanding the frauds that had been committed, was fairly won. Through the Returning Boards of Louisiana and Kellogg's subsequent inauguration as Governor, he was compelled to suppose that the Democratic party had been guilty of no more than the usual frauds practiced by both parties in that State. Senator Morton says that he was perfectly willing to vote for the admission of Kellogg, and that he would have done so but for the fact that the Democratic party had carried the State by a majority of 8,000 on the face of the returns, and that the Republican party had carried it by a majority of 5,000 on the face of the returns, and that the Republican party had carried it by a majority of 5,000 on the face of the returns, and that the Republican party had carried it by a majority of 5

Senator Ferry's Illness.

A letter from Grand Haven to the Detroit Post gives the following in reference to the arduous labors of Senator Ferry which were doubtless among the predisposing cause of his illness:

The Senator has done an unusual and extraordinary amount of work during the past two years. The long and weary some session of Congress last year, lasting until August, was hardly over when he was called to take an active part in the long and exciting Presidential campaign. The undetermined results of that campaign left apparently an immense responsibility upon Senator Ferry, Vice President pro tem. The country, as it were, was leaning upon the Vice President. His name was on every one's lips. He was armed with consultations and interviews, hosted by his friends and denounced by his enemies. He was always at his post, always ready for committee work, presided over the Senate, and in general did the work of a half-dozen men. He might naturally have had some solicitude as to his re-election, or at least there was a necessity to keep posted and have to some extent his mind occupied for a time with the situation at home.

Then his brother's sudden and dangerous illness brought more anxiety, to which was added the cares incident to large business interests which now fell upon him. With the great mental strain of these concomitant labors it is no wonder that even his powerful constitution at length gave way. The immediate cause was the heat and close atmosphere of Chicago, where he spent Friday and Saturday, of last week. On Sunday he refrained and was taken sick. All that care and science could do have been done, and now the crisis appears to be over, and we rejoice that our worthy Senator is probably spared to us for a long life of honorable, public service.

If you wish to have a keep sake in your home, buy the Moss Covered Bucket chuck full of paper collars, Fox, Rose & Buttars.

No Celebration.—Inasmuch as the meeting which was to have taken place on Tuesday evening last to report progress in the celebration matter did not take place, we judge the people of our village have chosen to let the matter go by default. The unpleasantness which took place at the meeting two weeks ago was fully explained in our columns, and we have no desire to again refer to it at length. But suffice it to say, that leading citizens took occasion to castigate the head and all its leaders (present, of course) because that organization wished some slight remuneration for their music on the fourth. Now it is to be regretted that an imagination on organization as the band should be the rock upon which should be wrecked all the hopes of this community, and we say as a member of the band, go ahead and don't have any fear but the band can celebrate."

Justified by Facts.—Subsequent to the examination of our last by the Government Engineer, and previous to the supplementary estimate submitted by Col. Mansfield, Hon. John S. Dixon, through the Sentinel, had the justifiable audacity to criticise the $200,000 estimate of the Engineer, as being exhorbitantly high, and from a standpoint of sound knowledge of the value of material, he made an estimate amounting to only about half that of the Engineer, which contemplated about the same extent of improvement. Recent events have fully established the accuracy of Mr. Dixon's estimate. The extent of work as published for the guidance of bidders was intended to approximate to about the amount of the Government appropriation—$10,000—but the bid of Messrs. Darkin and Stickney shows that the work can be done for half the money. The same knowledge of facts upon which Mr. Dixon based his estimates have guided Mr. Stickney in his proposal for the work.

A DISPATCH from Constantinople of the 1st declares that an unpleasant condition of affairs prevailed in that city, and the collapse of the dynasty was momentarily expected. The Sultan dared not ride through the streets, and the heads of the Grand Viziers the result of Midhat Pasha and the expulsion of Christians were loudly demanded.

THE French Cabinet has forbidden all political meetings attended by over twenty persons.

ANTHONY TROLLOPE has just been elected President of Dowells.

SERVIA, Panjorinca, Queen of Holland, died at The Hague, on the 23d. She was fifty-nine years old.

ADVICES to Constantinople dispatches of the 3d, two strong Russian columns were within six hours' march of Erzeroum. The Turkish army had been flanked and was considered in a critical position.

AUSTRIA recently sent notes to the Porte and the Russian Government demanding a written declaration that the restrictions upon the navigation of the Danube should be removed at the conclusion of the war, and should in no way be a precedent in the future. On the 2d, both Governments gave the desired declaration.

On the 2d, a conspiracy against Prince Milan and in favor of the Prince of Montenegro was unearthed at Belgrade. Numerous arrests were made.

On the 2d, Gen. Grant and Minister Pierrepont left Paris, after a service in Westminster Abbey, and listened to a sermon by Dean Stanley. In the course of his sermon he alluded to ex-President Grant, saying that in the mind of the congregation there was one of the choicest citizens of the United States, who had just laid down the scepter of the American Commonwealth, who, by his military prowess and generous treatment of his enemies and adversaries, had restored unity to his country. "We welcome him as a sign and pledge that the two great kindred Nations are one in heart, and are equally at home under the paternal roof. Both regard with reverential affection the illustrious Queen of the Christian Hie." Dean Stanley also took occasion to refer to the historian, Motley, as one of the mightiest lights of the western hemisphere, a high-spirited patriot, one of England's most faithful friends, one of the best and purest spirits of this age, and one of the most brilliant and undying of the historians, who had told us, as none had ever told before, the stirring story of the Dutch Republic, which could almost be regarded as the parent of the American Republic. "There will be," continued the Dean, "a niche in the temple of fame for him, who henceforth will be laid in the hired land of his adoption, and who in life was honored by the respect and love of many a gifted ruler, statesman, poet and historian of the Atlantic." The people, the nobility and the Government of great Britain continued to overwhelm Gen. Grant with attentions.

IN consequence of the volume of water in the Danube, on the 4th, military operations had been altogether suspended.

THE Turkish Village Stozer was lately captured by the Montenegrins after a sharp engagement, in which both sides lost heavily.

THE Porte notified Austria, on the 4th, that, in consequence of her opposition, it had abandoned the idea of raising a Polish Legion.

THE remains of the late Mr. Motley were buried in London, on the 4th. Dean Stanley read the burial service.

BY an accident to a train on the Lehigh Valley Railroad in Pennsylvania, on the night of the 1st, two baths were instantly killed and seventeen other passengers were severely (four of them fatally) injured.

AN attempt was made, on the night of the 2d, to wreck an express train on the St. Louis & San Francisco Railroad, near Woodend Station, fifty miles west of St. Louis, but only the engine and baggage-car were thrown from the track, the engineer, fireman and physician of the road being killed. The outrage was committed by a gang of robbers, who fled when at the cars, their object doubtless being to throw the entire train from the track and rob the express and plunder the passengers.

THE twenty-fifth annual convention of the International Typographical Union commenced its session at Louisville, Ky., on the 4th. About fifty delegates were present.

A THOUSAND sweep over the Town of Mount Carmel, Ill., on the afternoon of the 4th, causing great loss of life and property.

two churches, two school-houses, the Custom-House and many stores and residences were reduced to ruins. One report places the number of killed at between fifteen and twenty, and scores more in a number of other persons were seriously injured. A tree broke and carried the post-office and contents a distance. The loss in property, would, it was thought, reach a million.

PERSONAL.

J. B. STILLSON, Salt Lake correspondent of the New York Herald, states that two attempts have been made to assassinate him, once on the evening of the 20th ult., and the other on the 31st ult. An investigation held by prominent Salt Lake citizens, on the 1st, tended to corroborate the statements made by Mr. Stillson.

POLITICAL.

IT was reported from Washington, on the 3d, that the Postoffice Department had sent a special agent to Louisiana to take action regarding vacancies, in both of which the parties nominally appointed to be Postmasters—one at Clinton, in East Feliciana Parish, and the other at St. Francisville, West Feliciana Parish—reported that, owing to the threats and opposition of white citizens, they were unable to take possession of their offices. In both of these cases representatives are made to the Department by citizens whose good standing is indorsed by Congressman Elam, to the effect that the new appointees are, by reason of illiteracy, etc., unfit for the positions. A thorough investigation will be made.

A Story with a Moral.

Dr. J. C. Ayer's condition preaches the warning sermon to the great North American dosage-die business man. Dr. Ayer went into business for himself before coming of age. He left even Benjamin Franklin's sage business maxims far behind. He disregarded the precept, "Early to bed and early to rise." It was not enough for him. He went to bed late and arose early. He worked twenty hours out of every twenty-four. He lived to make money. His devotion were unceasing at the altar of business. He thought business, talked business, breathed business, ate business and dreamt business. Business prospered. He moved from a small store to a larger one, and from that to one larger. He was one of the representative successful men. He was pointed out as a model of what could be accomplished by luminary, patience and perseverance. He lived in the shop, and could never get out of the shop. The great globe, with all its beauty and grandeur, with all it had to give of thought, association and sentiment, was for Dr. Ayer but a huge pill and a place wherein to make and sell pills. "Other worlds than ours," if reached, would for Dr. Ayer only have meant other little and big planetary pills and homes for sick Mercurians, Jupiterians and Saturnarians, who should first call themselves with Ayer's Pills. That was all the universe implied to Dr. Ayer. Mind thus shorted, forced, cramped and cramped into one idea, at last found itself exploded into one idea, at last that idea dominated and masters the man. Too much pressure for years of pills and business. No other thought or association to serve as a balance. The regulator gives way. Now he wanders about the grounds of a private asylum, not the ghost of fifteen millions of dollars joyed if he can drive an imaginary bargain with his keepers for an old wheelbarrow. And the man of over-mind business begs and whines in vain for the loan of forty dollars.—N. Y. Graphic.

Curious Umbrellas.

Though they did not invent the umbrella, the English have done much to develop and bring it to perfection. Between October, 1858, and July, 1871, no less than 282 improvements on the ordinary walking stick were patented in this country; and though some few of these patents refer to undisputed lustres, some 270 of them are for portable canopies. A considerable proportion of these open letters were granted for improvements in one or another of the subordinate parts of the sun-shielding such as ribs, stretchers, tips, handles, ferules, notches, splices; but the majority exhibit specifications that affect the general design or choice of materials for the articles. Indeed, an entire volume might be written about all the various projects for a perfect umbrella. The cheaper kind proves is an umbrella, with the drapery folded into a hollow stick, from which it is swung, thrown forth and expanded itself in a trice on the touch of a spring. The MacGregor umbrella may be used with equal effect against the rain or one's natural enemies, as it is fitted with a spear, and may be used as a bayonet. Just thirty years since an umbrella was invented for people with chilly hands, which had a curious little heating apparatus set in the handle. Draped canes have been fitted with sun dials, compasses and watches. The lady's parasol riding whip is familiar to everyone; but it is not everyone who has seen a needle-gun cane, a fishing-rod and a pipe stalk fitted with a capsule for the protection of the gentleman or smoker. What would fear old Izaak Walton have thought of a fishing rod fitted with an umbrella? The special feature of another umbrella is a long falling curtain that, on the expansion of the parapluie, hangs from the rips of the ribs and the edge of the covering to the ground. When he is in motion, the bearer of this umbrella has the appearance of an unusually tall and animated pillar post; and in order that he may see his way, the falling curtain is of

OUR NEW YORK LETTER.

New York, June 15, 1877.

In trying to decide what has been the main sensation of the last seven days, I am dazzled between the suddenly terminated libel suit, the seventeen-year locusts and the fish plague. I suppose Peter B. Sweeny would hardly thank me for the compliment of bringing him into such close company, and, besides, we have the letter at least as often as once in seventeen years, while a man like Sweeny doesn't turn up—luckily for taxpayers—nearly as often. So I think we shall have to give this gentleman our earliest attention.

The remembrance of the domestic scenes, the oratory and the great length of the Tweed trial had whetted the morbid appetite of the public for this sort of enjoyment to a high degree of sharpness; and curiosity being further stimulated by the former prominence and recent years of exile of this magnificent thief, the opening of the Sweeny trial found the court room packed to suffocation with an audience that was all eyes and ears, ready for a protracted session. But it was destined to be a disappointed crowd, for after the briefest of preliminaries, a consultation of the lawyers on both sides was entered into, and, after a few hours, it was announced that the duties of the city lies were compromised, and that all proceedings were at an end. It was a disgusted assemblage that then filed out of court, freely expressing their indignation at the turn things had taken; not so much probably, that the idea of compounding a felony grated upon their sense of propriety, as that they were thereby deprived of the pleasure of picking the tongues of each scandal as the suit might unearth.

The amount for which Sweeny has persuaded the city to give, in effect, a receipt in full for stealings of over a million, is $400,000, and even this the cunning criminal has arranged with the city lawyers to accept as coming from the estate of his dead brother James Sweeny, so as to leave in the record of the case nothing to show that he himself was required to refund stolen money. He thus gets himself whitewashed at the expense of his brother, and being left with a technically clear reputation and a large fortune of other people's money, he is said to contemplate a return to active political life, taking up his old Democratic affiliations. Rumor even goes so far as to lay out a partial programme for the employment of his peculiar talents; a programme embracing the election of the legislature next year with a view of giving Mr. Tilden Mr. Conkling's senatorial shoes in 1879.

The present season, indeed, to be the time spoken of by the poet "when the swallows homeward fly." Woodward and Sweeny have already "homeward flew," been taken in and done for, and now Dick Connolly's son-in-law pops up and plainly intimates that that distinguished statesman would like to leave the elevated society of the Alps and return to the city whose finances he kindly cared for some seven years ago, if he can arrange to do so without having to cool his nose for a period against the grating of a Ludlow Street cell. And the city, having her hand in, just now in this settlement business, intimates back that she shall be happy to see him and will only charge him $1,000,000 for the privilege. The two will probably haggle over the price for a while, and then Mr. Connolly will turn up in his old haunts and settle down to the enjoyment of the $1,000,000 or more which this arrangement would leave him.

Meanwhile, old Tweed shakes the bars of his cage in angry indignation at this easy treatment of his junior confederates, but cannot as yet shake off the clutches of the law which seems to have singled him out as the one scapegoat on whom to pile all punishment.

The seventeen-year locust, who comes next to the above mentioned gentry in order of present importance, is enjoying, a quiet bird. Why he shows up at such long and odd intervals, like a comet, is a mystery. The conundrum of what he does with himself in off years is too many for even the big forties. Why he grows so big and accomplishes so little, and then so soon are all among "those things that no fellow can find out," for that is really known about him is next to hanger around earthground somewhere for a good twelve-month, he gets a good "ready," and then burrows up to the top, leaving a little round hole to mark the place of his appearance, as regular and clean cut as that of a pistol bullet. How he performs this latter operation is another puzzle, for when he gets to the surface he is still tightly encased in the hard, transparent, yellow shell that has protected him during his subterranean residence. But he manages it somehow, and on his arrival in the air, cracks his shell and comes forth a little soft white bunch which hardens and blackens and chirps with a rapidity totally incredible to one who has not witnessed it, so that within a couple of hours from leaving the chrysalis he is a replica in every part.

A finished locust of this variety is more like an enormously fine anything else I can think of. It is almost an inch and a half long, with black body and head and little goggle eyes exactly like two dots of red sealing wax. Its only beauty is in its wings, which are as large as a small willow leaf, delicate, gauzy and prismatic. I remember hearing years ago that this insect always appeared in time of war, of which it bore the sign. Curious on this point, I picked one up the other day to look for this sign, and, sure enough, on each wing I found a W as plain as pikestaff. Whether the Russo-Turkish struggle is enough to satisfy its predictions, or whether we have got to get up a row in this country to save its reputation as a prophet, time will tell.

The locusts are hatching by the million out in Eastern New Jersey, where their whirring noise as compared to creeping steam. They live but a short time and apparently do no damage to crops or vegetation of any kind. A good sunny blow over to this city where they attract much attention.

And not satisfied with reviving one Egyptian plague New Jersey is introducing another in the shape of dead fish. All on a sudden last week the shore of the Passaic and other streams near this city began to be covered with smaller varieties of fresh water fish, which for a few days seemed to die almost by the million. The air is tainted for miles around, and the inhabitants of Newark, Paterson and other towns which depend upon the Passaic for water are in serious trouble. No one can account for this unparalleled occurrence.

While Gen. Grant is being dined and wined by the effete aristocracies of Europe, we of New York are given the opportunity of honoring the Chief Executive of a sister republic, by the presence here of the President of Bolivia. The honorable Bolivian, however, gets scanty attention, on official notice having been taken of his coming or sojourn. The object of his visit is stated to be the attraction of New York capital to the completion of certain important transportation facilities within his realm.

The annual races at Jerome Park have been progressing during the week, but under a wet blanket. The absence of the pool sellers, whom the law has ejected from their old stands, and the almost constant rains of several days, have made hard lines for the jockeys. A novel feature introduced this year is the addition of games by the Pete Club, which prove no small attention. The club misses its moving spirit, James Gorden Bennett, who continues in voluntary exile as a result of his rather ridiculous duel with young May last winter. It is now reported that he has leased a fine estate in England, which he purposes to occupy and enjoy in his own peculiar fashion during the hunting season.

At the theatres generally this is a time of benefits, farewell performances and windings up for the season. The exception to the rule is the Fifth avenue, where the musical burlesque "Evangeline," with Eliza Weathersby, is proving a great hit, being just the sort of thing for the hot weather and super-excellently well played. It will be continued indefinitely. Notwithstanding the close times, the season has been far from a bad one for the reputable theatres, and the prospects for the next fall are good.

For nearly a quarter of a century this sterling preparation has been effecting cures of the various diseases to which it is adapted, and thousands of persons, of perfect reliability, in all classes of society have borne evidence to its wondrous remedial efficacy.

As a remedy for diseases of the Throat and Lungs it has achieved a popularity rivalled by that of few proprietary remedies. Experience has shown that for those who are troubled with weakness of the Lungs it is the best possible protective against Consumption, and it may be relied on with certainty to eradicate Bronchitis, Asthma, Croup, Diptheria, and Soreness of the Chest.

Coughs of the most obstinate kind are speedily overcome by it, and since a simple cough is very prone to develop into serious Inflammation of the Lungs, the early use of Dr. Wishart's Pine Tree Tar Cordial is earnestly recommended, as it invariably prevents the further progress of the disease.

Dyspepsia, Loss of Appetite, Torpidity of the Liver and of the Kidneys are promptly overcome by this superb vegetable corrective, which not only regulates but strengthens the organs of digestion, as well as those of the urinary and biliary secretions. It imparts unwonted relish for the food, and, by promoting digestion and assimilation, enriches the blood, which is the natural motor of vital energy and nutriment to the system.

Dr. L. O. C. Wishart's Pine Tree Tar Cordial thoroughly regulates the Bowels, removes Blind and Bleeding Piles, banishes from the circulation dropsical and all other impurities, and effectually counteracts a tendency to Gravel. It also entirely obviates the weaknesses incident to females.

Dr. L. O. C. Wishart's Pine Tree Tar Cordial is no mere placebo. It is a standard medicine, and has been repeatedly recognized as such by the press and members of the medical profession, who emphatically endorse the popular verdict long since rendered in its favor.

Sold by Druggists everywhere.

A TRUE STORY OF THE SEPOY REBELLION.

The first outbreak in India occurred in February, 1857, at Barhampur, and succeeded, during the month of May, in the mutiny and massacres at Meerut, Delhi and Lucknow, and the proclamation of the Mogul Empire. Then, with appalling, fiendish quickness, followed the atrocities at Cawnpore, Delhi and Lucknow, by which time England, in the white heat of her wrath, had thrown her legions into the Himalayan jungles, and the swarthy devils were sent howling to the mountains, or distributed over the surrounding country from the throats of her cannon, while Sepoy Sahib slipped across the northern boundary, into Thibet, where he seems to have vanished forever from human purpose.

It was during the early summer of 1857, when the horrible rites of insurrection flamed for hundreds of miles along the Ganges, that the banking firm of Boreman & Brother, of Calcutta, became much exercised over the non-arrival of a messenger of theirs that had started from Allahabad, in the month of May. This city lies on the Ganges about 570 miles from Calcutta, in the very heart of the northern district.

Boreman & Brother had purchased the famous Singee diamond in Allahabad, at an enormous price, the draft having been forwarded by their messenger. In the early part of May a telegram was received from the parties from whom the gem was purchased, saying that the draft was in their hands, and the diamond had been turned over to Nuddee, the messenger, who had started homeward on the day preceding.

This was all enough, though their mail was fully a fortnight late, due, no doubt, to the disturbed state of the region through which he was traveling. And one week later came a dispatch in cipher from Nuddee, stating that he had reached Benares, and would leave again in the course of a few hours, the diamond being safely in his possession. This telegram was delivered to Boreman & Brother so soon after being sent that they immediately replied, advising their agent in case he found himself in personal danger to conceal the jewel in some secure place, telegraphing them at the same time cipher directions how they should find it.

This message was returned from the Calcutta office with the information that it could not be forwarded, as the telegraph wire had just been cut east of Benares, which was in the hands of the mutineers. Some months were to elapse before any broadway could be made across the seething, raging, bloody whirlpool. It is well known that they were orgies of massacres and atrocities unparalleled in savage warfare.

Boreman & Brother could only wait in the hope that the ferocious fury and cunning of their agent would bring him and his jewel through in safety. There was so much surprise and apprehension in Calcutta, and indeed throughout India, at that day for the fiendish exposé and mockery of the pretended loyalty of the Sepoy, that it was not likely the banking firm would make much sympathy, great as was the loss it stoke to them.

Nuddee seemed to have been a treasure wealth about him in the shape of several thousand dollars in cash, and it was natural that they should find a market. They seemed to be good reason to suppose that the latter would be the case, as he had traveled upward of seven hundred miles in safety, and was now within a few days of the boundary, and passage could be had to Calcutta from the north-western frontier without passing through the infected country.

But they were disappointed. Such was the fact. The succeeding fortnight passed by, forbearing what was likely to happen, and, possibly, wishful faith in the justice of Allahabad, and by that means saved the genuine.

The Mistake of a Captain in the Turkish Navy.

There is even a report that the Ottoman fleet passing in a Turkish fort mistook it for Odessa and bombarded it, and that the Turkish fort had conscientiously answered the fire. There is an old anecdote in circulation here, which is now given as an absolute fact, and as such implicitly believed. It is so funny and apropos that it will bear repeating. The Sultan Abd-ul-Aziz was very proud of his fleet and desired to show a sample of it to England. He therefore ordered one of his captains to go to England to salute in his name Queen Victoria. The ship sailed, and while in the Mediterranean all went well; the pilot was still on board. But when Gibraltar was reached and the pilot about to take his leave the Captain explained the sad fix he was in. He felt himself wholly incapable of making an English port. Out of this perplexity the pilot drew him by showing him a steamer steering for England.

"Follow that ship," said he, "she is going to England."

So it was done all day and all night. But during the darkness the guide was lost. At daybreak a ship was seen on the horizon, and the Turk followed it with all confidence. Four days passed, then six, then eight, then ten.

"I feel not sure England was so far," said the discreet Captain.

At length a great port was sighted. The stupefied Turk sailed, the news [illegible] and asked the Captain in English what he desired.

"I come on behalf of my master to salute your Sovereign." At the word Sovereign, the stupefaction of the visitors was complete.

"What Sovereign?" asked the chief [illegible]

"Queen Victoria. Am I not in England?"

At these words all the people of the country began to laugh.

"You are in New York," they cried. At first it was not believed. During the first night they had lost the steamer which should have guided them, and they had followed another, believing it to be the same ship. I repeat that this story is given as absolutely true.—Odessa Cor. N. Y. Herald.

"What are you doing here?" asked a New York policeman of a lousy unfortunate leaning up against a store lamp. "I'm (hic) injoy'n' m' freezin' (hic) Post Cap.

The Cenci Palace.

I happened to chance on a steep and narrow street, and cropping what looked like a palace at its head, I climbed up and found myself in a little square, on the walls of the Palazzo Cenci. A notice upon the door gained me speedy admission, and I was shown with great courtesy through the suites of apartments of the once splendid palace, the scene of many tragic events. The present owner is a banker of Rome, and has lately added to the interest of the place by the restoration of the frescoes with which the walls of the principal rooms are covered. These frescoes were the work of Guido, and represent the history of Beatrice Cenci, from her childhood to her execution. Some of the heads are very beautiful, and the whole series is full of interest. The last fresco represents the execution of Beatrice and Lucretia in the Piazza di Ponte Sant' Angelo. The figures are small, but the whole scene is given with great spirit. The executioner is standing behind Beatrice, and is about to strike the fatal blow. Lucretia is kneeling in front, with her head bent down, awaiting the stroke. Both victims are dressed in white, and have their hands tied behind them. Their beautiful hair falls down their backs, and Beatrice's is confined by a band of pearls. Behind the executioner is a crowd of spectators, and in the distance the Castle of St. Angelo. The whole picture is very touching, and the faces of the victims are full of resignation and sorrow. Some of the heads in the frescoes are portraits of the Cenci family, and that of Beatrice is said to be a faithful likeness. It is a beautiful face, with a look of sadness in the eyes that is very touching. The frescoes are in a very good state of preservation, and are well worth a visit.—Rome Cor. Troy Times.

JUSTICE COURT.—Before Justice Clark on Wednesday Gurley Book pleaded not guilty to the offense of creating a public disturbance on Sunday night, but the court imposed a fine upon him of two cents and costs of prosecution—amounting to $2.06, and he went on his way rejoicing. Daizell complained on himself before the court, and was fined the cost of prosecution. He too has learned a lesson.

JESSE T. M. Cooley, of this state, has been named in connection with the vacancy in the associate Justice chair, caused by the death of Judge Ramsdell. No more fit man can be found in the United States, notwithstanding the people of Michigan would regret exceedingly to part with him; they cannot refuse the honor if it should be tendered to one of her most deserving men.

REV. J. M. Whitney met with a slight accident one day last week, on the M. E. Camp grounds, where he has been engaged for two or three weeks assisting Elder A. P. Moore in building a cottage. It seems that a hammer had been left lying on one of the cotter beams or scaffolding aloft, and as Mr. W. was carrying a ladder along underneath, the hammer fell off, striking him just above the temple, causing him to fall to the ground senseless for a moment or two.

A number of ladies have put their heads together, and propose giving a grand strawberry and ice cream festival, on Wednesday evening next, for the benefit of the Cadillac Brass Band. This is an undertaking deserving of the greatest success. Every citizen of this city should lend a "helping dollar."—Cloam Lake News.

This item moves us to refer to the band question here. We have a band of the ability of which modesty forbids us to speak—but they have some conceit—which receives no word of good cheer, no encouragement, but rather rebuffs and slurs. But instead of being discouraged at this treatment, they will go on in their steady improvement, and by their deeds heap coals of fire on the heads of their enemies.

Our dispatches of this morning give the impression that England may, at any hour, become involved in the war now in progress. In fact, if we are to believe the telegrams, only the dread of going against popular sentiment has prevented the declaration of hostilities before this. Russia's course within the support of the masses, the Disraeli government will never, if it can help it, permit the Czar to gain an outlet by the Black sea and a foothold on the Persian Gulf.

There is a skeleton in the closet even in the houses of royalty. Reports and rumors, which are apparently not without some foundation, have for some time been afloat, of a secret sorrow in the princely household of England. The well-known unsavory habits of the Prince of Wales are culminating in their natural fruit, especially in the domestic circle. This fact is doubtless an explanation of the recent statement in London circles that the Princess of Wales will proceed as soon as possible to take up her permanent residence at her father's court in Denmark. The alleged cause of this serious step is an unpleasant difficulty which has arisen, and in which a lady of title is concerned. The late severe sickness of the Princess and all the sorrows of this once beautiful and even noble daughter of royalty are alike traceable to the misteady conduct of her husband. Should a separation take place, it would be a great scandal, and a lasting disgrace to the heir-apparent of the British throne. There have been many children by the union of Prince of Wales and the Princess Alexandra.

Pine about stumps a lot of dry rubbish (there is nothing better than dry sawdust) and after setting fire on fire cover it with damp or wet sawdust. This is upon the plan of a coal kiln, and if one wants pay for his labour he can put out the fire at the proper stage and make a few bushels of charcoal. It not he can let the whole thing burn to ashes. One who has tried this plan says it is a perfect success.

Charlevoix People to Celebrate After All.

The patriotism and public spirit of our people has manifested itself in a sudden and concerted effort to celebrate the Fourth, and it is expected that the national birthday will be commemorated in a manner that will equal if not eclipse the demonstrations of last year. Our citizens will be awakened at sunrise on the morning of the 4th by the ringing of bells, and blowing of steam whistles.

At 10:30 a grand procession will be formed at the Fountain City House and will march to the grove headed by the Charlevoix Cornet band, where the following ceremonies will take place:

BEAUTIFUL TREES.—"A thing of beauty is a joy forever," and nothing possesses more of the elements of natural beauty than a fine tree in full foliage, at several places in the highways of our village there are fine thrifty trees that should be boxed in and protected at the public expense. The wisdom of such a step would in a few years manifest itself forcibly to us when our streets are rendered beautiful, cool and shady by these old settlers.

SOUTH ARM.—We visited the Head of South Arm on Friday and hastily took a few notes of what we saw. Cole & Co.,—the "Co." of which is Mr. Stohlman a very pleasant and aggreable gentleman—are doing a good mercantile business, and deal largely in wood and bark. They are a very enterprising firm. On the same side of the Head Mr. Isaman still continues in business at his old stand and seems to be doing well. On the other side of the Arm Mr. Empey is as active as ever in the same line of business. South Arm has a promising future.

POLITICAL.

THE Ohio State Greenback Convention met at Columbus on the 6th, and nominated: For Governor, Stephen J. Johnson, of Miami; Lieutenant-Governor, John B. Powell; Treasurer, John Junkins, of Tuscarawas; Supreme Judge, Samuel L. Adams; Clerk of the Supreme Court, Charles Bussell; Attorney-General, Marshall O. Wagner, Member of the Board of Public Works, Jacob Riblett; School Commissioner, J. C. Logan. The principles of the National Independent party, which supported Cooper and Cary, are reaffirmed. The resolutions demand an unconditional repeal of the Specie-Resumption act of Jan. 14, 1875, and arrest of the present plan of resumption; declare that it is the prerogative of the Federal Government only to supply currency, and that all moneys, whether paper or metal, should be issued by and bear the stamp of the Government; declare that paper money, made receivable for all dues and a legal tender in payment of all debts, and interchangeable bonds bearing an equable rate of interest, will afford the best circulating medium ever discovered; declare in favor of abolishing all banks of issue; favor a remonetization of the silver dollar, and making it a legal tender for the payment of all coin bonds, but oppose the issue of bonds for the purchase of silver bullion for coinage; favor taxation of United States bonds, a re-enactment of the law taxing incomes, and declare it the duty of the Government to foster and encourage the development of the resources of the country, that labor may be fully and profitably employed, and the general welfare established and secured.

PETER COOPER has addressed a long open letter to President Hayes, criticising the past financial policy of the General Government, and also making out the proper course, in his opinion, to be pursued in future. He says: "Our National currency must be made receivable for all purposes by ourselves and the country, and interconvertible with 3 per cent. Government bonds. Such a currency would have been worth more to the American people than all the gold mines that have ever been discovered or the Continent of America." He advises that silver be withdrawn from circulation and used in the purchase of foreign bonds, and that the fractional paper currency be revived.

A Wonderful Invention.

ANOTHER invention, wholly unlike that of Prof. Bell, yet related to it, as electrifying another phase of the same wonderful and mysterious element in nature, has appeared to share with the telephone, the telegraph and the magnetic needle the glory and triumph of magnetism. It is a means of utilizing the power of the permanent magnet for mechanical purposes; something which, like the transmission of sound through hundreds of miles of space, until recently has been regarded as an impossibility.

Electro-magnetism, as everybody knows, has been made available as a motive power, but only for limited uses, on account of the inconvenience and expense of maintaining the powerful batteries required; but the power of the permanent magnet, inexhaustible, as it is, and costing nothing, has, like gravitation, been considered until now wholly impracticable for mechanical uses. But as in the case of some other great inventions, what was supposed to be impossible has been achieved.

The new invention is that of Prof. Wesley W. Gary, lately of Pennsylvania, now of this city, who exhibited his invention on Thursday evening last before the Institute of Technology and has shown it to hundreds of our citizens, and who, unlike the proprietor of the "Keeley motor," does not seek to shroud his discovery in mystery but invites the fullest investigation, and submits it to the severest scientific and mechanical tests.

It will be seen, at once, that by the simplest, but at all who have observed the ordinary phenomena of magnetism that when a bar of soft iron is made to approach the poles of a permanent magnet, it becomes magnetized, and while in that condition is powerfully attracted by the magnet, having polarity and the power of attraction and repulsion like other magnets, opposite poles attracting and like poles repelling each other. But Prof. Gary has discovered what is not generally known, that as the bar of iron is made to approach the poles of the magnet, when very near, yet not quite in contact, its polarity changes, the positive pole becoming negative and the negative pole positive. The discovery of this law is the very point on which the invention turns. By causing the bar with a very slight current of electricity to produce an equilibrium between the magnetic power of the bar and that of the permanent magnet, the polarity of this current being changed, by means of a special changer, to correspond with the change of polarity in the bar, at the instant such change takes place attraction ceases and repulsion begins, and a reverse motion is obtained.

Then by using two magnets, or sets of magnets, one to attract while the other repels the bar of iron, which may be attached to a walking beam, pendulum, or other lever, a motive force is given with a rapidity and regularity suited to any mechanical use, and with a power limited only by the power of the magnets applied. It is as if the pile-driver should discover a means whereby, at the instant his falling hammer reaches the earth, the power of gravitation could be reversed and all the ponderous weight that had to strike an upward blow and raise it down again with the same force as before, and so on perpetually.

In usage the ordinary electro-magnetic power, the current of electricity must be equal to the power of the magnet which it supports, but in this case, as compared with the available power of the permanent magnet, the power of the electric current may be less than one to one hundred, and it may be taken from a small galvanic cup, or it may be generated by the motion of the magnets themselves, so that the cost of producing it is nearly nothing.

The engines which Prof. Gary has already constructed on the principle are of the size for running dental machines, sewing machines, jig saws and other small machines requiring little power, but he sees no reason why, by using larger magnets, and more of them, the available power may be increased indefinitely.

The easiest way of disposing of Prof. Gary's claim is to denounce it as a humbug, as the public has done to many other things that appear incredible. But there is no doubt that, as he sees his invention working successfully day by day before his eyes, he believes it genuine, and if some of our savans who know all about such things do not expose the fallacy soon, there is danger that he will dispose of his invention, and it may be doing good work in half the Nation before its worthlessness is discovered. As he does not close his doors nor discourage scientific scrutiny and investigation, here is a chance for some wise philanthropist to save the world from another unsufficient impositor.—Boston Commercial Bulletin.

A MONUMENT is on foot to rescue the architecture of Judge Cooley, of the Supreme Court, to the vacancies in the United States Judgeship of the Sixth Circuit, caused by the recent death of Judge Emmons.

ABOUT a week ago, Otto Jansen, a young German, highly esteemed and widely known, having for some years held the position of book-keeper and teller in the private bank in East Saginaw, left the city in company with Miss Ebsall, daughter of one of the first families of the city, on a pleasure, report said, he was engaged. Investigation of the books of the bank showed a shortage of $728, and an officer started in pursuit of Jansen, as he was traced to Detroit. Soon after, arrested and brought back, arriving on the 7th. The young lady returned with him, and it is understood that during their absence they were married.

JACK HORN rescued a drowning gamin from the river, at the foot of Woodward avenue, Detroit, on the 5th, losing his gold watch and chain, worth $150, in the act. This is a 15th rescue.

GOV. CROSWELL has appointed Hampton Richardson, Cadwallader Divine & Greenville, and Thomas F. Moore of Adrian, to be the Board of Managers of the State House of Correction and Reform, which will commence business during the present summer. Messrs. Rich and Divine were members of the Board of Building Commissioners for that institution, and have both been State Senators. Mr. Moore was an influential Representative from Lenawee County in 1873-4. Senator Richardson was a Democratic War Governor. Mr. Rich is a merchant.—Lansing Republican.

Improvements in Torpedoes, Etc.

MR. H. Bolen Pritchard, in a recent communication to Nature, describes some of the new weapons of naval warfare which are most likely to be used on the Black Sea and the Danube. Lord Charles Beresford said of the Whitehead torpedoes that they "could do almost anything but talk;" they are manufactured at Fiume, Austria, and it is believed have been sold in large numbers to both combatants, but especially to Russia. Great Britain manufactures her own Whitehead torpedoes, having paid a handsome sum for the use of the invention. Although the details of the machinery are kept secret, the following points are somewhat known. It is a cigar shaped, about twelve feet in length, and its motive power is compressed air. It is shot from a tube, under water, the direction being given by pointing the tube as if it were a gun. The compressed air is then admitted to the pressure on startling of 600 pounds to the inch, and operates machinery that revolves a screw propeller in the stern of the projectile, so that the whole apparatus goes through the water beneath the surface at a speed of twenty-four miles per hour for 600 yards, or sixteen knots per hour for 1,000 yards. This projectile is appropriately called a "fish." Great trouble is being carried on in some of the dockyards to keep secret the method of rendering the torpedo buoyant, so that it will keep at any depth required. The difficulty is to counteract the weight of the machinery. Many ingenious methods have been suggested, but the most simple is one that is proposed by Mr. Rich, who is a mercantile marine engineer.

A FUNNY FELLOW.

'Twas a funny little fellow
Of the very purest type—
For he had a knott as mellow
As an apple ever ripes
And the brightest little twinkle
When a funny thing occurred—
And the brightest little twinkle
Of a laugh you ever heard;

His smile was like the glitter
Of the sun in frogue banks;
And his talk a score, a twitter
Than the swallow understands;
And he kept him soup the biggest
Of a pun, or crack a joke,
Would make you laugh and snigger
Till every button broke.

He was meek as any quaker
When it turnenest him a desire
Solemn as an undertaker
If occasion should require;
He could wrastle like you pleased him
With a somerfelt behind,
And I tell all weeping creatures
To the cry tomb of Grief.

He hadn't any money—
Had a stroke which bends
To make a fellow "honey"
In the palate of his friends—
He swatched every story
That entertainer could begin
With the confidence and glory
That his friends were genuine.

He wasn't learned—may be so—
Equally like standing laughed at them for Yet I never saw a lady
That wouldn't own for him;
I never knew a mother
But urged a kindly claim
Upon him as a brother,
As the mention of his name.

The sick have ceased their sighing,
And have even found the grace
Of a smile when they were dying
As they looked upon his face;
And I've seen the eyes of laughter
Melt in tears that only ran
As tho' they opened after
One another just in fun.

He laughed away the sorrows,
And he laughed away the gloom
We are all so prone to borrow
From the darkness of the tomb;
And he laughed across the ocean
Of a happy life, and passed,
With a laugh of glad emotion,
Into Paradise at last.

And I think the angels knew him,
And had gathered to await
His coming, and run to him
Tho' the safely-opened gate,
With their faces gleaming sunny
For his laughter's sake, and thanking
"what a funny
Little angel he will make!"

WHAT WALL STREET DID.

A Convicts Story.

I had a position in check with a firm in Wilson street, which I shall call Wilson, Carter & Co. I became a boarder in the family of a relative, and continued with him four years, when some changes in his business determined him to remove to San Francisco. I was then about 21, and I commenced, for the first time, what is called a bachelor's life. It was somewhat dull at first, but I soon began to make acquaintances, and it offered far greater attractions. Nay, more, I had now secured so fair a position that I was the hope of the firm, that I was frequently a guest at their tables, and it is only justice to myself to say that I soon regained their confidence, it certainly did not arise, on my part, from any lack of zeal, that my former employers had reposed in their services. One day when I was dining at the house of the senior partner, I met a certain Mr. Robert Thornton, one of the principal clerks in a large insurance office. He appeared a very gentlemanly, intelligent man, and had evidently seen a great deal of life. We left the house together, and I found he resided but a short distance from me, and the night being fine, he offered me a cigar, and we walked home together.

On the different subjects we conversed on during our walk, the one on which he appeared to take especial interest was speculating in stocks. Curiously enough, while engrossed for five years within a few blocks of the Stock Exchange, where I knew fortunes were constantly changing hands, I had never felt tempted to try my luck. My employers, indeed, were strongly opposed to it, and I had heard at least one of them denounce stock speculation as gambling of the worst kind. But I knew, too, that other merchants of equally high standing laughed at them for this, and Thornton, I soon found, was well stored with arguments to prove it every bit as legitimate as the many mercantile speculations also be reconciled. There is no doubt that an iron-clad struck by such a "Devil-fish" would be sunk almost instantly. There is serious talk of providing iron-clads with a sort of crinoline, petticoat of wire, to extend to some distance outside the vessels, and this is said to be an effective device. But iron-clads are quite awkward enough to manage now, without such additional incumbrance. It will be rare fun for the cartoonists if the idea should ever come to grief.

Mr. Pritchard says that the Danube boats have the screw of any little inconvenience together with two years' interest, which I had allowed to accumulate, my salary for the last two years having been simply sufficient for my wants. I was satisfied that it would have been a lucky thing for me if I had lost every cent of it. But, as it happened, Thornton's instinct was not at fault, he sold out at just the right moment, and I found myself as he had predicted, worth $20,000, besides several old landlords with which I indulged in champagne, cave suppers and other expensive luxuries which I had hitherto entirely avoided.

I had taken special pains to deposit my money in the bank, keep my secret, and attended steadily to my regular business. Thornton, too, kept his affairs from his employers, but continued to speculate with his share of the profits made off my capital, and with such success that in a few months he was worth as much as I. My resolution to be satisfied with what I had made, and impart fortune no more, gradually wavered, and I yielded to the continued prosperity, and when he came to me with secret information of a prospective movement in Wall street, which I could not comprehend, for the first time, while I

OUR NEW YORK LETTER.

New York, June 22, 1877

Pursuing the subject of the ring cases which continue to form, as last week, the most important local object within the range of public vision, I am called upon to report an act of bad faith on the part of the prosecution, which is in every way indefensible. Tweed's confession was given to the Attorney General months ago under what he claims to have been a positive assurance that he should be called as a witness by the city and then released. But whether this promise was absolute or not, it was certainly an acknowledged stipulation that no use whatever should be made of this confession unless the prisoner was set free. Such an agreement between prosecutor and prisoner has been repeatedly held, by the highest courts in the land, to be one of the most sacred obligations which can be entered into; but in this case it has in reality been shamefully violated. To be sure, the city's lawyers did not publish the document, but they held it on various pretexts through weeks and months, until their possession of it enabled them to get a much better settlement out of Sweeny than could have effected without it, meanwhile showing it to everyone implicated by its contents, and drawing from these persons what their defense would be in case the matter should be pressed; and now, having got all they want of it, the honorable counsel return the papers to Tweed, with word that on the whole they have decided that it is not of sufficient value to warrant his release.

This bits of sharp practice is so generally condemned that quite a revulsion of feeling in favor of the prisoner is already evident. If they are not careful the authorities will make a martyr of the great criminal—a result which ought to be sedulously avoided, as it would counteract all the good effects of his prosecution.

A newspaper rumor attributes the rejection of Tweed's confession, after so much hesitation, to the fact that it cuts too broad a swath; that its publication would hit a number of active politicians too powerful to be safely injured. For the sake of common decency it is to be hoped that this rumor is false, as it probably is. We are likely to know more about the matter before long, as Tweed's counsel intimates that the confession is to given to the press.

On Monday last Tammany received Governor Robinson with great eclat, and on Tuesday evening the Manhattan Club entertained this gentleman, together with ex-Governors Tilden and Hendricks, at what was the great Democratic affair of the season. "Big bugs" were there as plenty as in locust haunted Jersey, City, county, state and national officials fairly tumoled over each other in their pientitude, and hob-nobbed with numerous representatives of the local bench, bar, press and counting room. The occasion was ostensibly a complimentary farewell reception to Gov. Hendricks, who was to leave for Europe on the following day; but in reality it was intended to be a political meeting of great significance. Mr. Tilden's speech of that evening has already gone over the country, and has been interpreted to portend all sorts of direful events. One thing is certainly evident, both from this speech and from the similar one with which Mr. Hendricks followed; and this is, that the Democratic candidates of 1876 are not at all disinclined to be the Democratic candidates of 1880.

The brief period of rainy coolness has passed over, and a hot sun is warming the torpid wrath of summer sportsmen to the liveliest activity. Horse-racing is still in vigorous progress; the yacht fleet, cleaned, repainted and furnished up for fresh pleasures and fresh conquests, daily skim the bay; the baseballists have untied their hats and laid in their summer supply of arnica; and the croquet players, joining in the chase of the clearing heavens, rush eagerly upon the velvet lawn to raise lumps upon their own feet and the heads of their antagonists, in the heat of their noble contest. Unsatisfied, even, with the variety of sports which either by origin or long use may fairly be called American, our pleasure seekers, animated by the spirit which caused the imitation of Polo one or two seasons ago, have this year brought out the "coaches' carts," and merrily deal those nine outstanding practices by the Ladies' Out-door Club, a full-blooded and strictly feminine association which combines a minimum of athletic exercises, with a maximum of good eating, handsome dressing and gossip.

The events of the week in this general direction have been the annual regatta of the New York Yacht Club which was won by the Rambler amid the plaudits of a dozen steamer loads of spectators, and the sharp baseball game between the Boston Reds and the Earlhorns of Brooklyn in the championship series. The latter Club whitewashed the Boston boys very handsomely by a score of 7 to 0.

Of the theatres Daly's and Wallack's are still open, but fail to present as strong attractions as Gilmore's Garden on the Aquarium, both of which, being airy and adapted to promenade, are well attended by all classes of people. The great void in our amusement world this season is the unwonted silence of our magnificent Theatre Orchestra and the absence of those Central Park Garden concerts which in former years have been the redeeming features of life in the Metropolis during the hot weather I am most happy to state however, that this is likely to be the last season that we shall have to endure without Thomas, for the plan to which I have previously referred, for erecting a suitable structure to be the permanent home of this incomparable organization, has progressed so far that the project has become a fixed fact. The subscription books of the company having the work in charge are rapidly fill up at the office of Steinway & Sons, to whose liberality and active interest the success of this noble work will be due in no small measure.

The influence of the Steinway firm, with its wealth, its public spirit and its wide reputation, upon the progress and culture of music in this country will bear a high estimate. They have not only done more for their peculiar art than any other house, but to every deserving enterprise they give such hearty and substantial support as in many cases has assured an otherwise unattainable success. To the absolute superiority of their instruments they have just received the testimony of that queen of pianists, Mme. Essipoff, all of whose New York concerts were given in Steinway Hall, and who used the Steinway pianos at her every performance in America. Her tribune to this superiority is careful and discriminating, but it is hearty as that of Rubinstein and Liszt. Liszt, by the way, ought by this time to have a profound respect for the musical mechanics of America. Some time ago he chanced to see in the warerooms of the Hanover (Germany) agent for the Mason & Hamlin Organ Company, a cabinet organ which so far surpassed anything he had ever seen that he immediately gave orders through his agent for a similar instrument to be built in a particular manner which he described. This unsolicted order from the acknowledged king of the musical world was naturally felt to be something of an honor, when other makers would have given their ears for the privilege of presenting him with one of their instruments. Great pains and care were therefore taken with the Liszt Organ, which turned out to be, by acknowledgment of the makers, the finest they had ever produced, and which has elicited from the maestro a letter of wondering admiration. The improvements made during their study upon this instrument prove to unexpectedly great that they are to be permanently introduced into their manufacture, and the Liszt Organ will hereafter occupy a regular place in their catalogue.

Apropos of music, we have had one entertainment this week under novel circumstances. This was a concert given by Gilmore's Band and others, at the Lunatic Asylum on Blackwell's Island on the occasion of Gov. Robinson's visit to the institution. The performance was entirely for the amusement of the unfortunate inmates, who seemed to enjoy it as fully as though their heads had been more nearly "level."

RADIX.

A number of Quakers from the fruit-growing district of Delaware called on President Hayes the other day and one of them invited Mr. Hayes to take a trip in the fruit-growers' steamboat, the Mary Washington, saying: "Friend Hayes, I have a word to say. The Mary Washington was built by the fruit-growers mainly. As it is a temperance boat, and thou art, I see, a warm supporter of that good cause, I thought it might be a further inducement to accompany us, if that fact were known." "Oh!" blandly replied the President, smiling, "Mrs. Hayes has that matter in charge."

A Sterling Vegetable Remedy

Which Eradicates

DISEASES OF THE THROAT AND LUNGS, DYSPEPSIA, GRAVEL, PILES, URINARY TROUBLES, NERVOUS DEBILITY, PALPITATION OF THE HEART, TORPIDITY OF THE LIVER, CONSTIPATION, SCROFULOUS AFFECTIONS, AND FEMALE COMPLAINTS.

For nearly a quarter of a century this sterling preparation has been effecting cures of the various diseases to which it is adapted, and thousands of persons, of perfect reliability, in all classes of society have borne evidence to its wondrous remedial efficacy.

As a remedy for diseases of the Throat and Lungs it has achieved a popularity rivalled by that of few proprietary remedies. Experience has shown that for those who are troubled with weakness of the Lungs it is the best possible protective against Consumption, and it may be relied on with certainty to cure Sore Bronchitis, Asthma, Croup, Diptheria, and Soreness of the Chest.

Coughs of the most obstinate kind are speedily overcome by it, and since a simple cough is very prone to develop into serious Inflammation of the Lungs, the early use of Dr. WISHART'S PINE TREE TAR CORDIAL is earnestly recommended, as it invariably prevents the further progress of the disease.

Dyspepsia, Loss of Appetite, Torpidity of the Liver and of the Kidneys are promptly overcome by this superb vegetable corrective, which not only regulates but strengthens the organs of digestion, as well as those of the urinary and biliary secretions. It imparts unwonted relish for the food, and, by promoting digestion and assimilation, enriches the blood, which is the natural motor of vital energy and nutriment to the system.

Dr. L. O. C. Wishart's Pine Tree Tar Cordial thoroughly regulates the Bowels, removes Blind and Bleeding Piles, banishes from the circulation dropsical and all other impurities, and effectually counteracts a tendency to Gravel. It also entirely obviates the weaknesses incident to females.

Dr. L. O. C. Wishart's Pine Tree Tar Cordial is no mere placebo. It is a standard medicine, and has been repeatedly recognized as such by the press and members of the medical profession, who emphatically endorse the popular verdict long since rendered in its favor.

Sold by Druggists everywhere.

THE SECOND MRS. LUTTRELL.

"Things begin to look lively over to Luttrell's. Such a hauling up as there is in that house, nobody in Ashcomb ever saw before."

"You don't say!" ejaculated Mrs. Jones, gathering up the pea-pods in a more compact heap, and making room for her neighbor by her side.

"Sit down, Mrs. Baynor, sit down, do, and let's hear all about it. For one, I am glad if old Luttrell has finally got his match."

Neighbor Baynor seated herself on the door step, and pushing back her sun-bonnet, gave vent to a fuming laugh.

"I tell you, Sarah Jones, Mrs. Luttrell is enough for a dozen like him. I never enjoyed anything more in my life than I did Luttrell's trouble this morning. It as nice royal pie we've had—a fat pig to the butcher, and taken a note. The note finally became due a day or so ago, and Luttrell offered to gather the money for her. To this she agreed, and her liege lord not only got the money, but spent the big-o half of it before he got home. I happened to be there when he came, and she asked him for the money in my presence. If possible, he looked more dogglish and unbearable than ever.

"'Here's five dollars. I had to use the rest,' said he, handing her a five-dollar bill.

She flashed fire in a minute.

"'You break a liberty that I will not sanction,' she cried, her eyes fairly snapping. 'I tell you, John Luttrell, you have no more right to spend what belongs to me than you have to use the preacher's salary, or the money belonging to your neighbor. What is mine you must let alone. It's no better than stealing.'

"He began to swell up and bluster, and get red in the face.

"'See here, ma'am,' said he, pompously. 'I'm the boss of this concern you've awhile. I don't intend, either, that both of us will carry an individual pocket-book. I have always had charge of the money, and I always will, and when you want anything you can come to me for it. If the request is for necessary things it will be granted. The first Mrs. Luttrell will be granted.'

"She got so white around the lips that I thought she was going to faint. But she didn't. She walked right up, and layin' her hand on his arm, says she:

"'That's enough. Everybody knows about the first Mrs. Luttrell, and everybody knows how you starved her and abused her little children. Don't mention her again, especially before Mrs. Baynor here, who was the poor creature's friend, and could not find among her wearing apparel enough articles in which to dress the body decently. As for individual pocket-books, much as you protest against them, they are an actual necessity with you and me, and will have to be endured by you, at least until you have learned to behave like an honest man.'

"Good," ejaculated Mrs. Jones. "It's a pretty time of day for him to bring up his first wife. It was the talk of the country how he misused her. She did the polishing as long as she could get to the cow-yard, and when she got so bed that she couldn't walk to the barn, Luttrell had the cows driven to the door-yard, and milked 'em there."

People of his stamp usually get come up with sooner or later, and I guess he'll find that the second Mrs. Luttrell will wipe out a few of the evil deeds he committed against the first."

John Luttrell knew that he had what in neighborhood circles is called a "bad name."

He knew that the people said openly that he had abused his first wife, and that it was the marvel of the town when he married his second one. But he did not care for that. He was too stingy and mean to hire his household labor done, if he could prevent it by marrying a drudge, to whom he was compelled the payment of wages for the service of her hands and body.

But, with all his meanness, John Luttrell was wise enough to know that he must look for his second wife in some region remote from his own home.

He had a keen eye to business when he selected Martha Hall, a spinster, of uncertain age. She owned a small farm in a neighboring state, near that of a relative of his own, and she was famous for her housekeeping qualities, as well as for the possession of a tongue keen and sharp as a sword.

The courtship had been prosaic in the extreme.

Luttrell had been recommended to Miss Hall by his relatives, as being "steady, an' no, or a "good business-turn," and "not overly old," and the said relative had actually received a letter in answer to one in which came the announcement of his wife's death, telling the bereaved (?) husband that the best thing to be done was for him to come on and marry Miss Hall.

Nothing but Luttrell immediately observed the business, and therefore, after his first introduction to the spinster, they were united and on their way back to Ashcomb.

To be sure, Luttrell did not tell his bride how long he had been a widower. No one of that, he thought, and she was a good deal shocked, the week after her installment in her new domicil, to be informed, by an officious caller, that the first Mrs. L. had died less than two months previously.

This was not all that she had discovered. Luttrell began to "lay down the law" in the way of extravagancies.

He offered coffee but three times a day, to be varied with an occasional kettle of mush.

There should be no pies, no cake, no preserves. Eggs must be sent to market, and the earliest and best of all the fruit went the same way. Hams were smoked and sold. Honey disappeared down the rapacious throat of the market, along with spring chickens and the butter, that grew into plump, golden rolls, under the skillful manipulations of the new wife.

Mrs. Luttrell number two closed her lips tightly as this phase gradually unfolded itself to her comprehension. Remonstrating, while she found it agreeable to prepare a separate pan of the table for her individual use.

The first time this plan was tried was at breakfast. At one end of the table she ordered it, without eggs or milk, a plate of pickles, and a glass of water. Directly opposite this primitive fare, and arranged around a solitary plate, were viands that would tempt an epicure.

Mrs. Luttrell smiled to herself as she called her husband to breakfast, but she made no comments.

Luttrell did not notice the difference in the two ends of the table until he was seated in his accustomed place. Mrs. Luttrell poured herself a cupful of coffee and helped herself to a fried egg.

In close proximity to his wife stood a great glass dish heaped with straberries and cream, and a generous slice of honey, snow white and glistening in its own richness, met his astonished eyes.

Luttrell's soul rose up in wrath.

"I thought I told you, Martha, that the fruit was reserved for the market!"

"So you did," said she, complacently.

"What do you mean by wasting it in this ridiculous manner?" he roared, holding his knife and fork upright in his rage.

"I mean to have enough to eat that, and if anything is left, the market is welcome to it," said she, calmly, taking a slice of ham.

"You've actually cut into my best honey cup."

"I know it."

"By George! madam, I can't stand this. I want you to understand that I'm master here."

"Yes, John, master, but not mistress," was the placid reply, as a morsel of delicate ham went into her mouth.

Luttrell sprang up from the table in a fit of blazing passion.

"What's that!" he asked, catching a glimpse of the meat ere it vanished. "Martha Luttrell," he thundered, "was that ham?"

"Ham," said she, sweetly, "and very good, too, after the long siege I've had on fat bacon."

Luttrell got up and went to the barn, livid with anger.

Luttrell had occasion to visit a neighboring city, and Mrs Luttrell desired to go.

"I have some purchases to make, my dear," said she, as he was about to demur; "and as we shall be gone over night, I will get Mrs. Houston to keep house for me while I'm away."

"Very well. And you'll pay Mrs. Houston, too, Mrs. Luttrell," he said, with a grim oath, as she climbed into the little buggy by his side.

"There'll be no difficulty about that," said she, pleasantly.

Mrs. Luttrell was very busy. She visited carpet stores, furniture shops, dry goods houses, and wherever she went she made large purchases, and gave her husband's notes for payment.

Last of all, she visited the marble works, and ordered three expensive stones.

carefully placed the first bacon swimming in grease, the corn bread baked as pensive things, but he dared not demur. She made purchases—heavy ones—but she bought wisely and well, and what she knew their income could afford.

People no longer look on Luttrell as a man whom nobody can conquer, but it may be safely said that a parallel between the characters of the first and second Mrs. Luttrell.—Marah Crosse Farley, in N. Y. Weekly.

The Holy Banner of Russia and Turkey.

It was stated as an important fact some weeks ago that the Russian regiments after their arrival on the Danube exchanged the Imperial standard for the holy banner of the Greek Church. Another statement was to the effect that every regiment was given, in addition to the National standard, the church banner representing the religion and the traditions of the old Greek Empire. This is untrue. It was held, the purpose on the part of the Czar to wage war in the name of the church and in behalf of the persecuted Christians of Turkey.

The Russian Imperial standard is yet now, charged with the double-headed eagle of Constantine the Great, symbolical of the Eastern and Western Empires, which were united under his rule. This emblem was adopted by Ivan I, on his marriage with a Princess of the Greek Imperial house. On the breast of the eagle, which is black, are emblazoned the ancient arms of Russia, St. George and the dragon, on a red field.

This Imperial flag is used only on great occasions. The common naval flag of Russia is a Greek cross in blue on a white field.

The holy banner of Russia, or of the Greek Church, is in imitation of the military standard adopted by Constantine the Great in commemoration of the appearance of the cross in the sky when he was on the march against Maxentius, the claimant to the throne of the Western Empire. On the eve of the decisive battle last ended in the defeat of Maxentius and the union of the whole Roman Empire under Constantine (A. D. 312), the Emperor, it is stated, saw, as in a vision, the cross in the sky, with the words, "By this conquer." He was the first Christian Emperor, and his great deeds and great conquests are associated with the standard of the Greek Cross.

On Constantine was bestowed the title "Caesar," and many writers have claimed that the title Czar had its origin in the title bestowed on Constantine the Great. The Russians represent their religion and the spirit of the old Greek Empire, and under the holy banner of Constantine and the church make war against the enemies of the old Empire or Greek Empire.

Turkey, like Russia, has two flags, one the imperial standard representing the power of the Ottoman Empire, and the other the flag of the Prophet, symbolizing the Mohammedan religion. The National or imperial flag is red, with a white crescent and star. This flag was the device of Hlano Byzantius, the patroness of Byzantium (Constantinople), and was hoisted by Mohammed II after the capture of Constantinople by the Turks in 1453.

The Mohammedan flag, or the flag of the Prophet, is dead black. There are two stories as to the origin of this flag. Tradition has it that the original flag of Mohammed was made from the white silk of the turban belonging to the chief of the Koreish, the tribe to which the parents belonged and the first tribe he vanquished. He soon substituted the black, however, making it from the curtain which hung in front of the door of his favorite wife; and this is the sacred relic, which, passing from Mohammed to Omar, the second Caliph of the Moslems, after many changes of hands, came into possession of the Sultans of Turkey. It was brought into Europe by Sultan Amurath III, about the close of the sixteenth century, and has been religiously guarded by his successors ever since.

When it is unfurled a religious war is proclaimed, and the Mohammedans throughout the world are called upon to defend the faith. The black flag has been associated with the most inhuman and cruel wars of history, with the wholesale slaughters and piratical acts of the Turks, when animated by a spirit of fanaticism, and has become the symbol of war to the death, of a war to which no quarter is granted, no prisoners taken.

But the flag of the Prophet is not responsible for the bad reputation of the "black flag" of murderous warfare. The character of the early wars waged in the name of the Prophet suggested the black flag as the emblem of war to the death. The unfurling of the flag of the Prophet means now that the Sultan of Turkey calls on Mohammedans in all nations to assist him with men and money.—Chicago Inter-Ocean.

At a recent meeting of the Society d'Encouragement pour l'Industrie Nationale, M. Montefiori exhibited electric lights which emit sounds when burning coal is placed in the interior. The sound is modified when the place occupied by the coal has been changed. A copper tube into which metallic gauze has been introduced two-thirds of its vertical length. M. Mouretat is preparing to build large tubes for the International Exhibition of 1878. In these the sounds may be heard at a great distance, and, if successful, he intends to propose this method instead of steam whistles for warning on the sea coasts.

—The other night a man whose head was almost completely bald, fell asleep in a saloon, and some wags, procuring a fine comb and some India ink, indulged in delicate tracery the words, "I use Wagner's Hair Invigorator." The old fellow was a bachelor, never knew the difference, and last night attended the theatrical performance at National Guard Hall. He occupied a front row to the infinite amusement of a number of people just behind him.—Virginia (Nev.) Chronicle.

"The Supernumerated O. G."

"I have been called a supernumerated goose," remarked a woman about fifty years of age, as she entered the Central Station yesterday.

She sat down and looked at the Captain for half a minute, and then continued:

"I have been called an ignoramus and I have told, and draw a parallel between the characters of the first and second Mrs. Luttrell.—Marah Crosse Farley, in N. Y. Weekly.

Returned From the South.

The Charlevoix Sentinel says that eighteen families who removed from that country to Arkansas about two years ago have returned back and settled down again in this vicinity, having become fully satisfied that this country is much better adapted to every way for settlers. There may be some in this section who are dissatisfied, and who may think that they might possibly be better in some other locality. We think the experience of these families would go to show that they had better remain contented where they are. How much better off would these same families have been had the two years of their absence been spent in clearing and improving their farms. We are confident that those who are contented to endure the hardships incident to the settlement of a new country, and work energetically in clearing up the land and building for themselves homes in this section, will be amply repaid in the future for all the privations and discomforts which they may now be placed under, and our advice to all would be to be contented where you are.—Cheboygan Tribune.

A COMPANY has been formed in France for the express purpose of carrying fresh meat from the United States to Havre. An immense capital has been subscribed, and a fleet of ten steamers, each constructed on a peculiar plan for supplying cold air to a thousand tons of meat during the voyage, will be built. One of these steamers will be ready in June. It is said the company will adopt New Orleans as the port for embarkation of the beef. It is believed that the beef can be put on board the steamers in America at six cents per pound, and sold in Havre for less than nine. It will then be cheaper for all good Americans to live in Paris than at home

We presume Tilden's defense to the suit brought against him for false income returns will be that as Mr. Hayes was not legally elected President there is no legal government in existence, and no court that has legal authority to try him. This defence will give him an opportunity to take the question on appeal up to the United States Supreme Court, and have it settled.

Cincinnati Times: "Whatever else may be said about the Southern policy of President Hayes, it has disabled one of the heaviest campaign guns of the Democracy. Every Southern State has now a Democratic Government, and the Democratic party is responsible for whatever self-government, or lack of it, exists throughout the South."

Hereafter all school boards or officers authorized to examine applicants for license to teach, or to give certificates of qualification to teachers, are required to collect one dollar, and from each female applicant a fee of fifty cents. The fees received by such examiners are to be paid to the county treasurer on or before ten first of January, April, July and October, in each year, and to be set apart as a fund to be known as an institute fund; to be used in defraying the expenses of a teachers institute, which is to be held in every organized county in each year, under the direction of the Superintendent of Public Instruction.

THE SENTINEL.

CHARLEVOIX, MICH.

WILLARD A. SMITH, Editor and Proprietor.

TUESDAY, JULY 5, 1877.

OUR NEW YORK LETTER.

New York, June 26, 1877.

Summer dullness henceforth is being considerably enlivened by what may be safely called a very pretty quarrel. And what is quite promising, the fight has already attained the age of nearly a week without any signs of old age, but, on the contrary, appears to be growing toward a still more vigorous maturity. It certainly ought to be a first class sensation, as indeed it is, for it possesses all the necessary elements of personality high toned participants and unlimited bitterness on either side. The fact is that the twelve tribes of Israel have been, figuratively speaking, stirred up with a long pole, and are being heard from on all sides. The pole in question was wielded by no less a personage than Judge Henry Hilton, A. T. Stewart's manager and largest heir, who as a part of his management of the Grand Union Hotel at Saratoga, which belongs to the Stewart estate, deems it best to exclude the Jews from that caravansary. In pursuance of his recent order to this effect, the hotel managers the other day met the application of Mr. Joseph Seligman for rooms in their establishment with the reply that he could not be accommodated. Now, Mr. Joseph Seligman is not only a respected banker with "barrels" of money, but is vice-President of one of the finest clubs in the city, and is a member of the Syndicate having charge of the placing of the last great government loan. So it will be seen that Mr. Joseph Seligman was just about the worst specimen (for Judge Hilton) that could have been selected for the inauguration of the proscriptive policy.

The result is that the learned judge finds he has stepped on a good deal bigger hornet's nest than he calculated for. Not only have the Hebrews flown to arms with their usual unanimity where the interests of their race are attacked, but a majority of the Gentiles join them in condemning that they pronounce an act of persecution worthy only of the middle ages. On the other hand, there is no lack of sympathizers with Judge Hilton's position. Everybody is being drawn into the dispute, which may or may not assume serious proportion. The Israelites threaten suit and the total withdrawal of their patronage from A. T. Stewart & Co., of which firm Judge Hilton is a member. The latter defies all these demons rations, and a wordy fight is still in progress.

Apparently undismayed by the fact of the eleven Molly Maguires who were swung off in Pennsylvania this week, a sacreligious desperado has just attempted the assassination of Father Fitzbarris of St. Joseph's Catholic Church, while the latter was going upon an errand of mercy to the bedside of a dying man. The assailant aimed a deadly blow at the pastor with a long keen knife, but the latter, catching the murderous arm, received but a slight wound. He immediately grappled with the ruffian, and though his inferior in size, held him till he could deliver him to an officer, when he calmly proceeded on his mission of charity. This strangeassault, on cause for which is assigned by its perpetrator, has made quite a local commotion among the Catholics.

Mr. P. T. Barnum, in imitation of Wm. H. Vanderbilt, who, by the way, got home a week ago, has run away from business and dull care generally via steamer Russia of Europe. Mr. Barnum electrified a reporter who has chased him on the boat for a farewell "interview" by saying that he believed they had got scent of Charlie Ross at last, and that he had left the $10,000 promised in his publiseed notice, in the hands of his agent in Bridgeport, to be paid over on the identification and restoration to his father of the missing youth. The latter, if living, must have grown up and changed to such an extent that it might be difficulty, even for his own parents, to recognize him when recovered.

Our distinguished legal, political and literary friend, Ben Butler, has favored us this week, delivering his lectrue on "The Irish Soldier in America," at the Academy of Music, on Tuesday evening. The lecture was for the benefit of a local Catholic charity, and the General was subsequently presented with a testimonial by the grateful beneficiaries.

The General has other business in New York, being engaged as counsel in the gigantic telegraph fight which is going on in our courts.

That wonder of business enterprise and hero of strange adventure, Dr. H. T. Helmbold, has finally got the better of the obstacles and prosecutions which have beset him for several years past, and has resumed business on his former magnificent scale. Whether his extraordinary man was ever really insane is a mystery which probably no one, himself excepted, can ever solve to the satisfaction of everyone. Not only did the doctors (who are in a chronic state of dispute, however) disagree over his case, but so also did the courts; and the war of interests, of which he was the center, agitated the cities of New York and Philadelphia for months together. But whatever may have been the facts of the case, there isn't much in his present course to indicate an unbalanced intellect. He was lately formed and become the moving spirit of the Helmbold Manufacturing Company, and in a shrewd and business like manner has addressed himself for the second time to the work of building up a colossal fortune. As a part of the expansion of their operations, which has thus far been steady and rapid, the company have just leased the magnificent old Drew mansion on Union Square, famous for having been for years the homestead of Wall Street's "Uncle Dan'l." The necessary alterations will be completed early next month, when New Yorkers are promised a sight of the finest drug establishment on the continent.

Some of our insurance companies smile a sickly smile when any one mentions the St. Johns fire. Only $20,000,000 loss!

Charles R. Thorne, the most popular leading man in New York, has shown symptoms of insanity, and has been compelled to leave the stage temporarily.

Mr. George Bignold, who, with his wife, was robbed of $8,000 in mone and jewels just previous to their late departure for Canada, has been unable thus far to obtain any trace of the missing property.

The Brooklin base ball nine did fair to capture the championship this year. Last week they blanked the Bostons, and this week they have administered to the Chicagos a coat of whitewash that s congressional investigating committee might well envy.

The Turkish war has been pressed into the service of our amusement purveyors. Niblo's Garden has just come out with a blood-and-thunder drama, entitled "Cross and Crescent," in which the Turks are torn limb from limb in quantities that awake the liveliest and most delightful emotions in the breast of the small boy who numerously haunt the pit.

Mr. Henry Ward Beecher, having a year or two ago cultivated the acquaintance of the law to a considerable extent, seems now to be unable to shake off his connection. Both he and the roaring Talmage have recently been made defendants to a suit brought by the Brooklyn Health Board against a number of ministers for failing to make returns of marriages as prescribed by law. The illustrious victim of hay fever and a late conspiracy does not propose, however, to lose much sleep or his summer vacation on this account, the suit being mainly a matter of form. A rumor is prevalent that he has been offered $25,000 by parties in San Francisco if he will spend his vacation in California this year and don some lecturing. It is not known whether this offer will be accepted or not; but I know at least one fellow in New York who wouldn't wait for a second offer—in fact, would be glad to get the vacation without the $25,000; and his name is RADIX.

Aimee is worth a quarter of a million, and is playing for $400,000.

The Democrats of Baltimore have nominated Col. George P. Kane for Mayor.

The Rev. Joseph Cook, of Boston, was married at Fair Haven, Ct., Saturday to Miss Hemingway.

Official returns from 136 counties in Georgia give 8,181 majority for the Constitutional Convention.

Mr. Webb left his famous silver service presented by the Somerset Club, to his grand-son, Ashburton Wadd, and most of it was sold by that young gentleman's guardian. Some pordons remain in the family.

A Sterling Vegetable Remedy

Which Eradicates

DISEASES OF THE THROAT AND LUNGS, DYSPEPSIA, GRAVEL, PILES, URINARY TROUBLES, NERVOUS DEBILITY, PALPITATION OF THE HEART, TORPIDITY OF THE LIVER, CONSTIPATION, SCROFULOUS AFFECTIONS, AND FEMALE COMPLAINTS.

For nearly a quarter of a century this sterling preparation has been effecting cures of the various diseases to which it is adapted, and thousands of persons, of perfect reliability, in all classes of society have borne evidence to its wondrous remedial efficacy.

As a remedy for diseases of the Throat and Lungs it has achieved a popularity rivalled by that of few proprietary remedies. Experience has shown that for those who are troubled with weakness of the Lungs it is the best possible protective against Consumption, and it may be relied on with certainty to eradicate Bronchitis, Asthma, Croup, Diptheria, and Soreness of the Chest.

Coughs of the most obstinate kind are speedily overcome by it, and since a simple cough is very prone to develop into serious Inflammation of the Lungs, the early use of Dr. WISHART'S PINE TREE TAR CORDIAL is earnestly recommended, as it invariably prevents the further progress of the disease.

Dyspepsia, Loss of Appetite, Torpidity of the Liver and of the Kidneys are promptly overcome by this superb vegetable corrective, which not only regulates but strengthens the organs of digestion, as well as those of the urinary and biliary secretions. It imparts unwonted relish for the food, and, by promoting digestion and assimilation, enriches the blood, which is the natural motor of vital energy and nutriment to the system.

Dr. L. O. C. Wishart's Pine Tree Tar Cordial thoroughly regulates the Bowels, removes Blind and Bleeding Piles, banishes from the circulation dropsical and all other impurities, and effectually counteracts a tendency to Gravel. It also entirely obviates the weaknesses incident to females.

Dr. L. O. C. Wishart's Pine Tree Tar Cordial is no mere placebo. It is a standard medicine, and has been repeatedly recognized as such by the press and members of the medical profession, who emphatically endorse the popular verdict long since rendered in its favor.

OUR NEW YORK LETTER.

New York, June 22, 1877

Summer dullness hereabouts is being considerably enlivened by what may be safely called a very pretty quarrel. And what is quite promising, the fight has already attained the age of nearly a week without any signs of old age, but, on the contrary, appears to be growing toward a still more vigorous maturity. It certainly ought to be a first class sensation, as indeed it is, for it possesses all the necessary elements of personality high-toned participants and unlimited bitterness on either side. The fact is that the twelve tribes of Israel have been, figuratively speaking, stirred up with a long pole, and are being heard from on all sides. The pole in question was wielded by no less a personage than Judge Henry Hilton, A. T. Stewart's manager and largest heir, who as a part of his management of the Grand Union Hotel at Saratoga, which belongs to the Stewart estate, deems it best to exclude the Jews from that caravansary. In pursuance of his recent order to this effect, the hotel managers the other day met the application of Mr. Joseph Seligman for rooms in their establishment with the reply that he could not be accommodated. Now, Mr. Joseph Seligman is not only a respected banker with "barrels" of money, but is vice-President of one of the finest clubs in the city, and is a member of the Syndicate having charge of the placing of the last great government loan. So it will be seen that Mr. Joseph Seligman was just about the worst specimen (for Judge Hilton) that could have been selected for the imagination of the proscriptive policy.

The result is that the learned judge finds he has stepped on a good deal bigger hornet's nest than he calculated for. Not only have the Hebrews flown to arms with their usual unanimity where the interests of their race are attacked, but a majority of the Gentiles join them in condemning that they pronounce an act of persecution worthy only of the middle ages. On the other hand, there is no lack of sympathizers with Judge Hilton's position. Everybody is being drawn into the dispute, which may or may not assume serious proportion. The Isralites threaten suit and the total withdrawal of their patronage from A. T. Stewart & Co., of which firm Judge Hilton is a member. The latter defies all these demons rations, and a wordy fight is still in progress.

Apparently undismayed by the fact of the eleven Molly Maguires who were swung off in Pennsylvania this week, a sacreligious desperado has just attempted the assassination of Father Fitzharris of St. Joseph's Catholic Church, while the latter was going upon an errand of mercy to the bedside of a dyng man. The assailant aimed a deadly blow at the pastor with a long keen knife, but the latter, catching the murderous arm, received but a slight wound. He immediately grappled with the ruffian, and though his inferior in size, held him till he could deliver him to an officer, when he calmly proceeded on his mission of charity. This strange assault, on cause for which is assigned by its perpetrator, has made quite a local commotion among the Catholics.

Mr. P. T. Barnum, in imitation of Wm. H. Vanderbilt, who, by the way, got home a week ago, has run away from business and dull care generally via steamer Russia of Europe. Mr. Barnum electrified a reporter who has chased him on the boat for a farewell "interview" by saying that he believed they had got scent of Charlie Ross at last, and that he had left the $10,000 promised in his publised notice, in the hands of his agent in Bridgeport, to be paid over on the identification and restoration to his father of the missing youth. The latter, if living, must have grown up and changed to such an extent that it might be difficulty, even for his own parents, to recognize him when recovered.

Our distinguished legal, political and literary friend, Ben Butler, has favored us this week, delivering his lecture on "The Irish Soldier in America," at the Academy of Music, on Tuesday evening. The lecture was for the benefit of a local Catholic charity, and the General was subsequently presented with a testimonial by the grateful beneficiaries.

The General has other business in New York, being engaged as counsel in the gigantic telegraph fight which is going on in our courts.

That wonder of business enterprise and hero of strange adventure, Dr. H. T. Helmbold, has finally got the better of the obstacles and persecutions which have beset him for several years past, and has resumed business on his former magnificent scale. Whether his extraordinary man was ever really insane is a mystery which probably no one, himself excepted, can ever solve to the satisfaction of everyone. Not only did the doctors (who are in a chronic state of dispute, however) disagree over his case, but so also did the courts; and the war of interests, of which he was the center, agitated the cities of New York and Philadelphia for months together. But whatever may have been the facts of the case, there isn't much in his present course to indicate an unbalanced intellect. He was lately formed and become the moving spirit of the Helmbold Manufacturing Company, and in a shrewd and business like manner has addressed himself for the second time to the work of building up a colossal fortune. As a part of the expansion of their operations, which has thus far been steady and rapid, the company have just leased the magnificent old Drew mansion on Union Square, famous for having been for years the homestead of Wall Street's "Uncle Dan'l." The necessary alterations will be completed early next month, when New Yorkers are promised a sight of the finest drug establishment on the continent.

Niblo's Garden has just come out with a bood-and-thunder drama, entitled "Cross and Crescent," in which the Turks are torn limb from limb in quantities that awake the liveliest and most delightful emotions in the breast of the small boy who numerously haunt the pit.

Mr. Henry Ward Beecher, having a year or two ago cultivated the acquaintance of the law to a considerable extent, seems now to be unable to shake off his connection. Both he and the roaring Talmage have recently been made defendants to a suit drought by the Brooklyn Health Board against a number of ministers for failing to make returns of marriages as prescribed by law. The illustrious victim of hay fever and a late conspiracy does not propose, however, to lose much sleep or his summer vacation on this account. the suit being mainly a matter of form. A rumor is prevalent that he has been offered $25,000 by parties in San Francisco if he will spend his vacation in California this year and don some lecturing. It is not known whether this offer will be accepted or not; but I know at least one fellow in New York who wouldn't wait for a second offer—in fact, would be glad to get the vacation without the $25,000; and his name is RADIX.

"DOMESTIC" PATTERNS.

CAUGHT IN A HOG.

A very unusual fatality befell Martin, whom the writer used to know and sometimes trapped with, since he had a very narrow escape from a most terrible death.

The unusual intelligence of a dog, that was not considered a very sagacious animal, saved him.

I place this incident with the "faithful dog" stories, though personally I am far from esteeming dogs as highly as many people do. I have often thought that if the number of persons who have had their lives saved by dogs were compared with the number who have died dreadful deaths from mad dog bites, the result would be far from favorable to the canine race.

Ed was that fall trapping otter on a large brook, known as the Bog Stream. This name was given because the brook flowed through an extensive bog, that was formerly the bed of a pond. The pond leaked in the course of time, piled up, except at the southern end, where there was still a shallow piece of water, called Mud Pond.

No trees nor shrubs had as yet taken root on the bog, save a few scattered clumps of chokecherry bushes. For the most part it was covered with moss, tussocks and cranberry, with here and there patches of cattails.

The stream wound through the bog in devious crooks. At some period in the past three mud huts been amazing freaks in here, for some of the logs of the bog, and at points back from the present stream, there were great ricks of drift logs and dumps, containing many cords of wood each. These must have been brought down from the forests on the hills above.

Throughout the bog, which must have contained two or three thousand acres, were open mud-beds, such as in the West are called "alkers." Indeed, the whole bog underneath the spongy moss was little better than a vast bed of soft mud. The surface moss trembled and shook beneath the foot. A person could almost anywhere be run down ten or a dozen feet beneath the moss.

Yet there was not much danger to crossing the bog so long as the person doing so kept on the moss, and steered the open belts of black mud, which were as soft as treacle. Even here the tussocks, when not too far apart, offered foothold.

The brook was well stocked with muskrats, chubs and a very thick-bodied kind of trout, and afforded good trapping. Ed had his other traps along the banks and beneath the roots of driftwood where the otters burrowed.

One morning in October he set off from home with his dog to visit his traps on the bog. The distance from his house was nearly four miles. The dog was one he had bought of an Ottawa Indian about two years before. It was of common breed (which means, I suppose, of no particular breed), yellow and white, shorted-legged, with a rather thick neck and head, not a large dog. Ed called it Jeff.

As Ed came out through the woods upon the bog, and looked across it, he saw that it was an oily calm. Although it is a natural creature disinbled up its back as it leaped, Ed knew it was an otter, though it is rare that an otter leaves its bread in the day-time.

The dog pursued her game closely, and after running fifteen or twenty rods, the otter took to the water. It was one of the ricks of driftwood a few yards from the brook.

Ed had given every rick on the bog a thorough examination, and he knew there was no burrow beneath this one; but directly across the stream, under the opposite bank, there was a fine deep burrow, where others often reinvested.

Ed was barking furiously at the rick, and the dog feared the otter would dart out and get under the opposite bank. So he ran at full speed to intercept and shoot the otter before it should take to the water.

He had forty or fifty rods to go, and between him and the rick was one of those long mud beds. It did not look very soft, Ed said, and he determined, in his haste, to try to cross it. It was not more than forty or fifty feet wide, while to go round it would take so much time that he might lose his game.

It would not be by putting the feet close together and taking very short steps of not more than three or four inches, with great quickness and dexterity, a man can cross a very small surface without sinking. I have often traversed soft snowbanks in this way. The feat consists in taking the second step before the first one has time to sink.

Ed knew of this mode of passing over dangerous bogs, and had often tested it. He tried it now. For the first twenty or thirty feet he succeeded in passing over the surface safely, but near the middle the mud was softer than he expected. He said, too, that a stick tripped him.

First one foot went into the soft mire and he sank nearly to his knee, then the other foot disappeared. Exerting himself to the utmost, he thoroughly recovered with mud, he every forcibly flung his gun to the bank, and using his hands to support himself, struggled to get through to the pile of driftwood.

But he sank into the slough amazingly. When he pulled one foot up the other sank still deeper. Ed was a strong, active fellow, not a flabby city man, and he made without a desperate effort to save himself. But he sank waist-deep in the soft, treacherous black mire before he realized his peril. Then it flashed upon him in an instant, and the cold sweat came out on his face.

If he had only kept his gun and used it to plant one foot on, he might have drawn the other up, and so escaped from his danger.

Collecting all his young strength, he now made a desperate struggle for life. But the soft, yielding muck held him as in a vise. His strained exertions only screwed to sink him deeper into the mire.

"I knew now," said he, "that I might just as well keep still, and let the slither the bottom. My struggles only made my danger the greater. There wasn't a thing I could get hold of, and I could literally feel myself settling."

Then he shouted and called "Help!" again and again, though he knew there was very little chance of making any person hear his cries, for there was not a house within three miles.

But he had not yet given up all hope of getting out.

"It did not seem as if a fellow need to lose his life in that way," he said; and he reated perfectly quiet, and tried to think of some way to get free. But there was no way. Inch by inch he sank lower and lower, till both his arms rested on the mud.

"I thought I could hold myself now," he said, "with both my arms thrown out straight, for I seemed to support myself by bearing on my hands. I then called the dog, but the dog was so excited by the game under the rick that she would not come. After a time, however, she ran back to the edge of the slough and whined.

"Then I tried to make her bring my gun to me, but all she would do was to whine and roll over. I couldn't make her understand what I wanted her to do. Yet she knew I was in trouble, for she would sit on the bank and howl and whine. Still, she wanted to go back to the otter and would start for the rick; but if I called, would turn back to me. At last I let her do as she wished."

Ed said that it seemed as if there were two enormous weights tied to his ankles, dragging him down. It was the suction. The upward pressure under his arms at length grew so intolerable that he had to raise them higher, though every inch thus yielded let him down deeper into the mud—nearer to death. He thinks that as much as an hour passed in this way, during which he was sinking very slowly, yet surely.

Jeff now came back to the slough of her own accord, and sat on the bank wagging her tail and whining.

"I took my cap off with one hand," said Ed, "and flung it at her. I had never tried to teach her to carry things, but now I told her to 'carry home.'

"At first all she would do was to play with the cap and roll over it. Then she picked it up and carried it a few steps, and then came back to the edge of the bank. I talked to her, but I got discouraged at last. She didn't seem to know what I wanted her to do. Yet a while after I stopped talking altogether, she took up the cap and went off twenty or thirty rods. There she left it and went to the rick. I heard her barking again; but she soon stopped.

"I was now too low in the mud to see where she went, but she did not come back to me. I supposed she had run off somewhere and left me."

Ed had sunk over his shoulders, though his arms were raised as high as his head. The cold, black mud oozed round his neck.

"It seemed as if two cold, black hands had taken me by the throat," he said, "and were just beginning to choke me to death."

Then he gave up all hope, and with that Indian like stoicism born of a life in the woods, resigned himself to die, like the brave he was, without a tear or an agony.

"I supposed it wouldn't take more than five minutes, anyway, after my head went under the mud, for I is smother me. Unless my gun was found I knew that my folks would never know what had become of me. I should keep sinking until I was so far beneath the surface that my body would never be found."

The mire rose above his chin, but by throwing back his head and drawing down one hand, he managed to reach it from his mouth and nose. He said that now many strange things occurred. Psychologists will set them down, no doubt, to exhaustion of the brain-nerves, but they are incredibly to have been caused by an overwrought imagination.

Every few minutes he declared that he could feel slight tremors of the whole bog. He could hear people talking in ordinary conversation at the clearings and farms miles away; and not only this, but he declared that he heard the dinner-horns, the cries of them everywhere, calling the farmers to dinner, and the noon whistles and bells in Bangor, fifty miles off.

"If the people could only have heard me as I heard them," he said, "I could have whispered, and they would not come to my help."

What is, perhaps, less strange, he assets that he heard the well-known voices of the two men who rescued him when they first stripped upon the bog, almost a mile from the spot where he was imprisoned, and knew the men were coming to help him.

By this time the mud had so compressed his chest that he could not speak loud enough to be heard more than a hundred feet. Just at this time he says that he felt queerly, was in a half stupid state, possibly a sort of lethargy, and did not care much whether he found him or not.

It seems that the dog, after barking at the otter, again took up the cap and went with it to a clearing that was between three and four miles to the southward of the bog. A settler, named Jarvis, was at work there piling logs.

An Indian, who had been hunting in the adjoining woods, was talking with Jarvis when Jeff came to them with the cap in her mouth.

Jarvis at once said: "That is Ed Martin's dog," and called her to them. The dog dropped the cap, and began to roll over, and bark and gambol. Jarvis supposed it was an old cap that the dog had found; but the Indian said: "There be hurt—somebody."

Then they both set off in the direction the dog had come. Jeff kept with them, running ahead and, after a manner, leading the way.

When they came near the imprisoned boy, the dog ran directly to the rick where she had driven the otter.

The men were more puzzled. But the Indian, who had been looking very carefully about, saw Ed's head in the slough. They seized logs and brush off the rick, and, throwing these on the mud, stepped out upon them and caught the poor fellow's outstretched hands. But they could no more pull him up than they could have raised a mountain.

It was only by stirring the muck round him, and thus breaking the suction, that they were at length able to rescue him from the death-grasp of the slough.

After his shoulders were out he rose with rather less difficulty, for he left his boots in the depths below. His legs and feet were numb, he could not stand, and could scarcely speak. Ten minutes more and he would have been under the mire and smothered.—C. A. Stephens, in Youth's Companion.

A Game of Huff Wet Played.

I had arrived at the outskirts of the town, and we stopped before a dirty-looking wooden cottage.

A tall man, dressed in a rag coal rencliing to his heels, bright yellow trousers, which were stuffed into a pair of red leather boots, while an enormous black sheep-skin cap covered his head, came out and asked my business. I said that I wanted three horses to go in the same stage, and asked him what he would drive me there for, the regular postal tariff being about two shillings.

"One of noble birth!" replied the fellow, "the roads are bad, but my horses will gain the whole day. They are excellent horses; all the people in the town admire and envy me. They say how fat they are! look, you round. The Governor has not got sublimer like mine in his stable. I spoil them; I cherish them; and they gallop like the wind. The people look, wonder and admire (some call me the dear life animate."

"I have no doubt of it," I said; "but will you take me for?"

"Let me say four rubles, Your Excellency, and you one seat account. One little whole silver ruble for the use of God let me put it in my pocket, and we will bless you."

"All right," was my answer. "Send the horses to the Tzarskoe Selo Inn immediately."

Presently the fellow rushed into my room, and, bowing to the ground, took off his cap with a grandiose air, then, drawing out the remnant of a pen, he dived into some hidden recess in the neighborhood of his skin, thrust the noble into my hand, and exclaimed:

"Little father, my uncle owns one of the horses; he is very dizzy. He says with the cap and roll over it. Then she picked it up and carried it a few steps, and then came back to the edge of the bank. I talked to her, but I got discouraged at last. She didn't seem to know what I wanted her to do. Yet a while after I stopped talking altogether, she took up the cap and went off twenty or thirty rods. There she left it and went to the rick. I heard her barking again; but she soon stopped.

"I was now too low in the mud to see where she went, but she did not come back to me. I supposed she had run off somewhere and left me."

Ed had sunk over his shoulders, though his arms were raised as high as his head. The cold, black mud oozed round his neck.

"It seemed as if two cold, black hands had taken me by the throat," he said, "and were just beginning to choke me to death."

Then he gave up all hope, and with that Indian like stoicism born of a life in the woods, resigned himself to die, like the brave he was, without a tear or an agony.

"I supposed it wouldn't take more than five minutes, anyway, after my head went under the mud, for I is smother me. Unless my gun was found I knew that my folks would never know what had become of me. I should keep sinking until I was so far beneath the surface that my body would never be found."

The mire rose above his chin, but by throwing back his head and drawing down one hand, he managed to reach it from his mouth and nose. He said that now many strange things occurred. as unhealthy. As regards the medicinal properties of cultivated celery, there are no illustrations of them in the United States Pharmacopœia; but as celery (Apium graveolens) belongs to the same family as the parsley (Apium petroselinum), it is probable that it would yield apiin and apiol, as such substances are obtained from the latter. Apiol acts as a tonic, similar in its effects upon the system to quinia.

The other mania, metallotherapy, to which we have already briefly alluded, is less harmless, and at present is confined to France. Les Mondes, of recent date, reports another "astonishing cure": —a child four years old this time, almost dead with meningitis. The metallotherapy inventor enveloped the infant—there is no Children's Protective Society in France—in plates of iron and copper from head to foot. Half of the baby was cured with one metal, half with the other, in order "that both metals might have an equal chance of doing good." In eight months the child revived. In six days, it was out of danger; in a month, it was well. Manufacturers of iron will no doubt be soon consult with blue-glass-makers as to how to advertise this.—Scientific American.

The Seventeen-Year Locust.

The reappearance of the seventeen-year locust, in myriads in the near future, has once was awakened a new interest in this insect. The fact that an insect can remain for seventeen years in the bowels of the earth, a sluggish, creeping worm, and then rise to the surface, throw off its coat of mail, and become endowed with the power of flight, basking awhile in the light and warmth of the sun, and then, while leaving the eggs from which another progeny is to come, and thus through the same course of life, is indeed marvelous. We have every reason to believe that these insects have appeared in North America at regular intervals of seventeen years for unknown ages, as they have done since the first mention of their appearance in the year 1357, and that only the seventeen year broods appeared quite generally over the country, but the thirteen-year brood is conjunctive in them, an occurrence which, according to the calculations of Prof. Riley, was recently found to have not been as rare as was ashamed."

"Quite right," I said; "you have every reason to be so; but go on; is your uncle's horse dead?"

"No, one of noble birth, not so bad as that; but my brother is weak. He has a share in one of the animals, he will not let me drive him to the next station for less than six rubles," and the man, putting on an expression in which cunning, avarice and pretended sorrow were equally, rubbed his forehead, and added, "What shall we do?"

I said, "You have a grandmother?"

"Yes," he replied, much surprised, "how did you know that? I have—a very old grandmother."

"Well," I replied, "go and tell her that, fearing lest she should be annoyed in any manner on her journey, I have sent my horses on before you, and you will follow in your own carriage."

I should keep sticking until I was so far beneath the surface that my body would never be found."

HOME, FARM AND GARDEN.

—To make the molasses candy of our grandmother's time, take one quart molasses; butter the size of an egg; shortcake a table-spoonful of saleratus; stir in flour enough to roll water; a teaspoonful of soda, to make it white and brittle, and a teaspoonful essence of wintergreen to be added when almost done. To be pulled while warm, with buttered hands, and cut in stacks.

—For meat roasting, chop any kind of cold meat quite fine; crumb the same quantity of side bread as you have meat; put a little of the fat of the meat in; season with salt and pepper and summer savory to suit taste; heat up one or two eggs, according as you need, and form your meat and bread into a thick paste with the eggs, then mold it into balls and fry a light brown color.

—We have found by practical test that early cut hay well cured is decidedly the best food for dairy stock, going much further when fed, and producing a better product of milk, and consequently butter. It keeps stock in finer condition than hay that is cut after being matured, or ripened. As early as the middle of June, some states before, we have practical opening of the hay harvest, and back when, during that the earliest cut is preferred to the last, by all the stock. When first getting this plan of cutting hay early into practice, the neighbors all old farmers—looked on strange with satisfaction, considering all such results, but upon noting the facts in the case, have fallen in with the practice with hearty good will.—Ohio Farmer.

Whenever we go we see the cucumbers in the open air sooner than we do on the ground. This is, no doubt, a result of the tropical sunshine. There it is necessary that the cucumber until it bloods freely and becomes perfectly numb. When this point is reached you are safe—all that is then necessary is to protect it from the dirt. Do not stop short of the bleeding and numbness, and do not on any account close the opening with plaster. Nothing more than a little simple cerate on a clean cloth is necessary. We have used and seen this used on all kinds of simple punctures for thirty years, and never knew a single instance of a wound becoming inflamed except after treatment as above. Among other cases: A cool-tooth going entirely through the foot, a rusty dam penetrating through the foot, a bad bite by a sucking pig, several instances of fire-shanks through the hands, and also chopped-off fingers and toes, etc., but we never knew a failure of this treatment.—Scientific American.

Chinamen at Their Meals, Etc.

It is a mistaken idea that Celestials eat nothing but roast rats and rice and a few other articles of plain and cheap vegetable food. This is about the extent of the bill of fare among the laboring classes, just as corned beef or cabbage is among our unwashed element. Of course they eat roast hog—all Chinamen, rich or poor, do. It is a part of their religion, just as it is of the Jews, to eschew it. To the Chinese is accredited the discovery of the exceedingly good thing we know as Chinamen dies, among other things placed on his grave is a sumptuous dinner—or whatever he may call it. The chief features of these edibles is a whole hog roasted. The better class of Celestials luxuriate in ducks, or canvas-back ducks, shell fish, tea costing $5 or $8 per pound, conserves and many other minutiæ, for which these Chinese only known to the Chinese epicurean. The first-class restaurants are beautifully fitted up with oil paint, red paper, and other gingerbread work, and at evening dozens of Chinese lanterns swing from the verandahs and entrances.

Most of the food used by them is brought from their native country, rice and tea. The tea used among the laboring class is even better than the article palmed off on the unsuspecting public as genuine Japan. Bees.

In well-pe sectioned hive containing 20,000 bees, there should be one queen, 500 males and the remainder workers. If a hive has no queen swarming can never take place, however crowded it may be. On the last day of a swarm a queen hive is thrown into the greatest confusion; they seek her in all directions, and if she is not found and restored to them in a short time they become disheartened and disorganized. The best protection against moths and worms is a strong colony, having a fertile queen and stores of honey. Such colonies are never injured by worms. The bees are not numerous enough to cover all the combs in a hive, the moth miller will deposit her eggs in the unprotected combs, and they will soon hatch, destroy all the worms he can find and replace only as many as the bees can cover and defend, and some are always destroyed, and some are always manufacturing, and some have no consideration in piling on the work; and these are the ones. And therefore say, who are always complaining they have no luck with help.

Janice and I were saying the other day, "said Allen, "that whoever has a good article finds a market for it. A better cause. We had butter enough but bought some of his because it was a little better. Then people in the next house did the same and for the same reason, then, generally speaking, it is just so with things. If a man has a first-rate picture he can sell it. If a writer has a first-rate poem or essay he can find a publisher will print it. If a carpenter is a first-rate workman, he'll find work plenty. If a professor excels in mathematics or chemistry or philosophy, or any other science, some college will be in a hurry to get hold of him. If a man has business talent and good judgment, and a reputation for uprightness, mercantile establishments will overbid each other to secure him. If a young man has ability, energy, integrity, activity and industry, some business firm, or other monetary worthies will pay for his services."—Central Christian Advocate.

—The New York Evening Post says the influence to adopt fine words instead of homely ones—the impulse which prompts some persons to speak of perspiring when in fact they are sweating—is spreading downward, as any attentive observer may discover, and we expect soon to hear mennyspeaking well-to-do-folks with aspirations for refinement cry "obverse" and "reverse" instead of "heads" and "tails."

Little Girls' Clothes.

The yoke slipson long worn by little girls from the time when short clothes are first put on up to five or six years of age are still popular when the yokes are cut in square Pompadour shape and the skirts finished with a Spanish flounce. A new effect, however, is given to these little dresses by laying box pleats down the front and back, instead of merely gathering the fullness into the yoke. There are these box pleats in front and three behind, reaching only to the waist line or below the hips, if she within a finger length of the little Spanish flounce. This makes the dress less bulky than the full skips gathered to the yokes, giving the slender appearance which now seems to be so fashionable for these little folks as for their mammas. White nansook slips made in this way have three broad rows of open-worked insertion down the yoke, and the clusters of box pleats, each one a full of edging as wide as the insertion. Cream-color, rose, lilac, pale blue, and navy blue wool dresses are made in this way. Scarsenets similarly made, but slightly shirter, are used for wraps or walking coats, with white dresses for the house beneath.

Simpler dresses than these just described, and more stylish because more clinging, are made with a box pleat down the neck down to within two or three inches of the edge of the skirt, and finished with a single ruffle. They have no yoke, and the only seams are those under each arm. The material is the same as for the more elaborate dress, and the garment fastens behind under the middle box pleat. The plain and flounces are more effective when the pleats are not sewed all the way to the top of the flounce, and this is done in many fine white dresses of fine muslin, but for cassories, ginghams, and linen lawns that are to be often laundried, this would prove troublesome. The material is then gathered full a three box pleats, down to the flounce, a bias band of the cambric is then used as a heading for the flounce, and the remaining box pleats must not be stitched on the edge, but merely sewed in the middle once, opened, and pressed flat. These have striped straw wry are worn with or without sashes, according to fancy. Fine white cords and tassels are used for the buttoned steel, but most of the colored stockings to show something of the color. stocking. The sash and cords, also the fine trimming, match in colors, and may be either plain solid color or may have white lines in cardinal red, brown, navy blue, or else very pale blue. The colored stockings are clocked or striped. Quite new are those with the sides, half way to the knee, and are of solid color above. Pale blue and rose colored stockings are very popular. Fine Balbriggans clocked with colors are the only white stockings now worn, as colored hosiery is used with white dresses.

Little girls' hats are not quite so large as formerly, the fine soft wool-faced felts with the wide lace trimmings being used instead. Pinches are still made, however, with princess shapes, and also the new Alice blue, where silk pleating is set in the back, and a sash is used to cover the join; the sash ends are left long in front and tied. Rejoice plaques are preferred to all others, and the trimmings are embroideries and ribbon bows.

Fine twilled woods and basket-woven stuffs in colors are now imported for children's wear, but these are found to be not warmer that piqué, and do not sell so easily. These are made up in the prim-est fashion, with the Russian blouse with all the weight suspended from the shoulders, and in unpleats, so that the skirt cannot be seen separating from the body, nor is the little figure confined by the belt. Newer still than these is the fancy just imported from Paris of making these dainty woolen up in the full box-pleated sacques described above for cotton goods, embroidered, and finishing them with the inevitable Spanish flounce. The upper part, which covers the manner of a cape with the body, is tined throughout with soft white muslin. The neck, sleeves and flounce are trimmed with Smyr insertion and lace, either all white or pale colored; the insertion, as well as the lace, is laid plainly on the colored good, without gathers, and is more effective than when edging it merely, as the material is cut away beneath the insertion. Cream-color, rose, lilac, pale blue, and navy blue wool dresses are made in this way. Scarsenets similarly made, but slightly shirter, are used for wraps or walking coats, with white dresses for the house beneath.

There are also simpler Breton sacques of these woolen goods made up with braids and gimps of brown. These have square collars and square pockets.

With the rest short clothes are worn little sacques of plain white muslin, made over white or colored silk tidings, and trimmed with insertions and edgings of Valenciennes lace, or the fine partly-colored russian lace.

More muslin and lace is used in these dresses than was formerly the case, but the general effect is not richer than it was, for the fabrics are simpler, and the trimmings are put on more tastefully. Plaited skirts of fine muslin, made over white or colored silk tidings, and trimmed with insertions and edgings of Valenciennes lace, or the fine partly-colored russian lace.

The following unsolicited testimonial from Rev. O. T. Walker, D. D., formerly pastor of Bond-st. Square Church, Boston, and at present settled in Providence, R. A Walking Miracle.

MR. H. R. STEVENS,

Dear Sir:—Though a stranger I want to inform you what VEGETINE has done for me.

Last August, as you may remember, I was in a very unenviable condition. I was a walking miracle, appearing on the streets, since getting out of my sick room, with a thick white substance in the seat, one on my head which was neither sore nor scab, but like the white scale of fish, only larger, and so thick that two physicians came to see me, one of whom said he had never seen the like before, though he had practiced medicine in this city for many years. Another physician came to me in the same city, and said he would like to see my scalp when it was well. After using VEGETINE for a short time the white substance began to disappear, and in a few weeks my head was entirely well, and has remained so ever since. I have also used VEGETINE for Dyspepsia, and found it a most excellent remedy. I have taken it myself, and given it to my children, and I can truly say that I have never found its equal as a blood purifier. I have recommended it to many others, and shall continue to do so, for I know it to be a most excellent medicine.

Yours, etc., WILLIAM O'PAYN

Reliable Evidence.

MR. H. R. STEVENS:

Dear Sir:—I will most cheerfully add my testimony to the great number you have already received in favor of your great and good medicine, VEGETINE, and I do not hesitate to say that it is the best blood purifier, for I was troubled over 20 years with that dreadful disease, Catarrh, and had used a distressing quite thus it would seem as though I could not get rid of it. I was induced to try VEGETINE, and after using three bottles I was entirely cured, and have had no return of the disease for over two years. I also think it one of the best medicines for coughs and weak, sinking feelings at the stomach, and advise everybody to take the VEGETINE. Any one doubting the above statement can call on me at my residence, Corner Magazine and Walnut streets, Cambridge, Mass.

WHITE BRONZE MONUMENTS.

THE BEST IN THE WORLD.

CAMP MEETING, ALTON, ILL., Sept. 18, 1874.

Some months since I received from O. J. Willard, of Maryville, N. Y., circulars relative to my establishing an agency of the White Bronze Cornithian Monuments for this section of country. I declined to call for the Monuments ordered, as circumstances had changed with me, but as I had been collecting orders for the Monuments several months and had obtained quite a number, I wrote him to that effect. He replied that he would like the orders I had obtained, and if I would forward them he would pay me for my trouble. I did so, and received a check for the amount. Being fully satisfied myself on all points, I purchased the county, and have since further experience in the business, I subsequently added to my purchase the adjoining counties of Pettis and Johnson. The Cornithian Monuments will be generally adopted wherever they are introduced. Yours truly, JAMES M. HOUSTON.

CAUGHT IN A BOG.

A boy, named Elwin Martin, whom the writer used to know and sometimes trapped with once had a very narrow escape from a most horrible death.

The unusual intelligence of a dog, that was not considered a very sagacious animal, saved him.

I place this incident with the "faithful dog" stories, though personally I am far from esteeming dogs as highly as many people do. I have often thought that if the number of persons who have had their lives saved by dogs were compared with the number who have died dreadful deaths from mad dog bites, the result would be far from favorable to the canine race.

He was that tall trapping otter on a large brook known as the Bog Stream. This name was given because the brook flowed through an extensive bog, that was formerly the bed of a pond. The pond had been, in the course of years, filled up, except at the southern end, where there was still a shallow piece of water, called Mud Pond.

No trees nor shrubs had as yet taken root on the bog, save a few scattered clumps of huckleberry bushes. For the most part it was covered with moss, the usual cranberry, with here and there patches of cattails.

The stream wound through the bog in devious crooks. At some points in the past there must have been amazing freshets here, for along the banks of the bog, and at points far from the present stream, there were great ricks of drift logs and stumps, containing many cords of wood and These must have been brought down from the forests on the hills above.

Throughout the bog, which must have contained two or three thousand acres, there were open mud-holes, such as in the West are called "slews." Indeed, the whole bog underneath the spongy moss was little better than a vast bed of soft mud. The surface moss trembled and shook beneath the foot. A policeman almost anywhere he ran down ten or a dozen feet beneath the moss.

Yet there was not much danger in crossing the bog so long as the person doing so kept on the moss, and avoided the open dells of black mud, which were as soft as treacle. Even here the tussocks, which nothing far apart, offered foothold.

The brook was well stocked with suckers, chubs and a very thick bodied, kind of trout, and Ed had good sport. He had his otter traps along the banks and beneath the ricks of driftwood where the otter harbored.

One morning in October he set off from home with his sled to visit his traps on the bog. The distance from his house was nearly four miles. The dog was one he had bought of an Odtown Indian about two years before. It was a cross-country breed (which means, I suppose, of no particular breed), yellow and white in color, with a rather thick neck and head, not a large dog. Ed called it Jack.

As Ed came out through the woods upon the bog, Jack suddenly started some animal from its cover. By the way the creature doubled me by back as it leaped, Ed knew it was an otter, though it is rare that an otter is seen abroad in the day-time.

The dog pursued her game closely, and after running fifteen or twenty rods, the otter took refuge in one of the ricks of driftwood a few yards from the brook.

Ed had given every rick on the bog a thorough examining, and he knew there was no burrow beneath this one; but directly across the stream, under the opposite bank, there was a deep burrow, where otters often retreated.

Jill was barking furiously at the rick, and the boy feared the otter would dart out and get under the opposite bank. So he ran at full speed to intercept and shoot the otter before it should take to the water.

He had forty or fifty rods to go, and between him and the rick was one of those long mud holes. It did not look very soft, Ed said, and he determined, in his haste, to try to cross it. It was not more than forty or fifty feet wide, while to go round it would take so much time that he might lose his game.

It is said that by putting the feet close together and taking very shorts steps of not more than three or four inches, with great quickness and dexterity, a man can cross a very soft surface without sinking. I have often crossed soft snowbanks in this way. The feat consists in taking the second step before the first one has time to sink.

Ed knew of this mode of passing over dangerous bogs, and had often tested it. He tried it now. For the first twenty or thirty feet he succeeded in passing over the surface safely, but near the middle the mud was softer than he expected. He sank too, and a sick, dizzy feeling.

First one foot went into the soft mire and he sank nearly to his knee, then the other foot disappeared. Expecting nothing worse than to be thoroughly covered with mud, he (very foolishly) flung his gun to the bank, and leaning forward to support himself, struggled to get through to the pile of driftwood.

But he sank into the slough amazingly. When he pulled one foot on the other sank still deeper. Ed was a strong, active fellow, not a boy to be thus imprisoned without a desperate effort to save himself. But he sank waist deep in the soft, treacherous bank and before he realized his peril. Then it flashed upon him in an instant, that the cold sweat came out on his face.

If he had only kept his gun and used it to plant one foot on, he might have drawn the other up, and so escaped from his danger.

Collecting all his young strength, he now made a desperate struggle for life. But the soft, yielding mud took him as in a vise. His utmost exertions only served to sink him deeper into the morass.

"I knew now," said he, "that I might just as well keep still, and the stiffer the better. My struggles only made my danger the greater. There wasn't a thing I could get hold o', and I could literally feel myself settling."

Then he shouted and called "Help!" again and again, though he knew there was very little chance of making any person hear his cries, for there was not a house within three miles.

But he had not yet given up all hope of getting out.

"It did not seem as if a fellow need to lose his life in that way," he said, and he fretted perfectly mad, and tried to think of some way to get free. But there was no way. Inch by inch he sank lower and lower, till both his arms rested on the mud.

"I thought I could hold myself now," he said; "with both my arms thrown out straight, for I seemed to support myself by bearing on my hands. I then called the dog, but the dog was so excited by the game under the rick that she would not come. After a time, however, she ran back to the edge of the slough and whined.

"Then I tried to make her bring my gun to me; but all she would do was to whine and roll over. I couldn't make her understand what I wanted her to do. Yet she knew I was in trouble, for she would sit on the bank and howl and whine. Still she wanted to go back to the game, and would start for the rick, but if I called, would turn back to me. At last I let her do as she wished."

Ed said that it seemed as if there were two enormous weights tied to his ankles, dragging him down. It was the suction of the mire below. The upward pressure under his arms at length grew so intolerable that he had to raise them higher, though every inch thus yielded let him down deeper into the mud —nearer to death. He thinks that as much as an hour passed in this way, during which he was sinking very slowly, yet surely.

Jill now came back to the slough of her own accord, and sat on the bank wagging her tail and whining.

"I took my cap off with one hand," said Ed, "and flung it at her. I had never tried to train her to carry things, but now I told her to 'carry home.'

"At first all she would do was to play with the cap and roll over it. Then she picked it up and carried it a few steps, and then came back to the edge of the bank. I talked to her; but I got discouraged at last. She didn't seem to know what I wanted her to do. Yet a while after I stopped talking altogether, she took up the cap and went off twenty or thirty rods. There she left it and went to the rick. I heard her barking again; but she soon stopped.

"I was now too low in the mud to see where she went, but she did not come back to me. I supposed she had run off somewhere and left me."

Ed had sunk over his shoulders, though his arms were raised as high as his head. The cold, black mud oozed round his neck.

"It seemed as if two cold, black hands had taken me by the throat," he said, "and were just beginning to choke me to death."

Then he gave up all hope, and with that Indian like stoicism born of a life in the woods, resigned himself to die, like the hunted otter he had set, without a tear or an outcry.

"I supposed it wouldn't take more than five minutes, anyway, after my head went under the mud, for it to smother me. Unless some one was found I knew that my folks would never know what had become of me. I should keep sinking until I was so far beneath the surface that my body would never be found."

The mire rose above his chin, but by throwing back his head and leaning down one shoulder he managed to retain his mouth and nostrils above it. Then a most strange thing occurred. Psychologists will set them down, no doubt, to exaltation of the senses, but they were likely caused by an overwrought imagination.

Every few minutes he declared that he could feel slight tremors of the whole bog. He could hear people taking in ordinary conversation at the clearings and farms miles away; and not only this, but he declared that he heard the dinner-horns, the scream of fifes everywhere, calling the farmers to dinner, and the noon whistles and bells in Bongor, fifty miles off.

"If the people could only have heard me as I heard them," he said, "I could have whispered, and they would have come to my help."

What is, perhaps, less strange, he assures that he heard the slips and cries of the two men who rescued him when they first stepped upon the bog, almost a mile below the spot where he was imprisoned, and knew the men were coming to help him.

By this time the mud had so compressed his chest that he could not speak loud enough to be heard more than a hundred feet. Just at this time he says that he felt queerly, was in a half stupid state, possibly a sort of lethargy, and did not care much whether they found him or not.

It seems that the dog, after barking at the otter, again took up the cap and went off to the rick. There she left it and went to the rick. I heard her barking again; but she soon stopped.

"I was now too low in the mud to see where she went, but she did not come back to me. I supposed she had run off somewhere and left me."

A VISION.

Written for the Sentinel.

You write anything for the CHARLEVOIX SENTINEL, Ruel Grant Traverse, would not be very much of a surprise, even to Nestor and myself, but just who I am going to do it.

A few years ago—let them be few—I was a married gentleman residing in an humble little home on what was known as Antrim city. That eternal town I mean to see yet.

It was perched upon the summit of a sand dune, which to me was a fine image of the great nations as depicted in some of the old geographies. The bone and sinews of this prophet's shadowy of native industry, manufactured products, in the big wrecked sawmill hard by. It was roofed with cedar and pole-framed mill, mostly purloined lumber, like a vessel in distress. It remained one of the apparitions who was set to polish a veneered bureau, and he ported poor progress, for he found it so hard to get the look of the bark of the bark of like the lover furniture after his sweetheart to peal it. It was to such a one I keep Bishop Auer sentenced me, and Bishop Clark was kind enough to bless the house so that for a fence of years I adopted Antrim City as my particular ward, I profess. I feel a peculiar regard for that yearly shore. And now, standing upon the little mound that I fondly styled, home, I want to make a few observations. But first let me just step over to Sickle's store, only a few rods off, and borrow his opera glasses, the only pair in the place. Was it there I learned an illustrative incident? I am not sure. An industrious housewife wished to obtain a darning needle. Sickles was out. Forty miles away was Traverse City. Thither she sent by the mail carrier. The first cost was not much, but the freight charges were twenty five cents, well and duly paid. Perhaps, it was there also I learned of another incident, that has, hitherto, escaped the greed of the newspaper reporters. A gentleman who was nobody's beneficiary, who filled a prominent county office for many years in Grand Traverse, eminently for his scientific attainments, visited a neighbor's one morning. A chair was placed before him, and he was politely requested to be seated. He replied as he accepted that he had not much time to stay, that his house was on fire and he just came to see if he could borrow a ladder. Remembering the motto of the state of Michigan, we may look about us. Up the beach, a few rods, is the fishery. A ravishing appetite led me there frequently. Under the trees are the nets. There is the reel, there the small fleet used in gathering the fruits of the waters. Down in the direction of New York Point is the dock, a long bridge, planked to a large extent with cedar. The dock itself and the adjacent lands is piled with cord on cord of the finest beech and maple woods, entitling them to an occasional schooner, which seemed to have a penchant for arriving Saturday afternoons, so as to gather all the vagrants there upon a Sunday. And here depends a tale, which I do not think has adorned Harper's Drawer.—The "Gen. H. B. Payne" was a propeller of liberal proportions for the bay trade. Captain Brown had charge of the helm. Our Dock was very shy of Antrim Dock nevertheless in case when business demanded he would bring his propeller alongside. One day the new steamer fluttered in the breeze. Standing upon his bridge, anxiously looking for passengers and cargo, he came to a side. An enterprising urchin wanted to send a letter. I am not informed, as to the sequel, but I am afraid our son of Neptune was not overmuch classical, nor yet, very pious in his exploitives. As though to make up for the wounded dignity, on a subsequent occasion a granger went on board for some item of business, real or imaginary, and was soon told that he had better be getting ashore. Not obeying, promptly, he was not less than twelve feet from dock when he would have stepped off. He sent parts of two days and one whole night on the great deep, paying full fare for his involuntary. I remember the gusto with which the Captain told of this practical "gook."

Up from the dock and out of sight of it, as well as from our chosen observatory, is the log school house. It stands in the edge of the "forest primeval." It was at the door of this incipient academy, that a certain pedagogue I wot of, won for himself such a reputation; quicker than ever Arnold of Rugby.

The latest enrichment of Antrim I must forget. Among the deciduous specimens, there was the white birch with silver trunk, rock-ribbly immortal by Schoolcraft, Longfellow, and the Indians themselves. As for the evergreens, there was the hackery and hemlock impenetrable cedar, the Norway pine, bedecked with a superb garden of lichens, and the stately arbor vitæ, with its round spicy stem and I will only add another, the balsam fir, with arrow stems and pointed pyramidal tops. I was greatly enamored of them. But ever against this emerald skirted landscape was the [illegible] shanty used as a school and synagogue as ever the sun of a great child. Away in the West, not on the natural highway, half a score miles distant, are the shores of Lockport, coal to commerce or mining locations, coal to commerce or mining locations, coal to commerce or mining locations

ADVICES from London telegrams of the 23d and 24th, the crossing of the Danube was intended merely as a diversion, the pestilential climate and the overflowed condition of the Dobrudscha forbidding any extended operations in that direction. The Turkish post of Matchin had been occupied by Russian troops. It was believed that the main crossing of the Danube would not be effected for some days. The total number of Russian troops in Roumania was stated to be 417,000.

AUSTRIA has formally refused to interfere in behalf of Montenegro, unless the latter acknowledge that she is hopelessly prostrate, and applies directly for assistance.

CONSTANTINOPLE telegrams of the 24th say the Montenegrins had been forced to evacuate Gatzko. The Turkish Commander of Deputies had voted in secret session to continue the war to the death, even if all Europe combine against Turkey.

AN Athens dispatch of the 24th says the passage of the Danube had greatly strengthened the war party in Greece, and that several regiments had left for the frontier. A Greek conspiracy had been discovered to Pallonlea.

IT was reported from London, on the 25th, that the English Cabinet had, after due deliberation, disapproved of Gortschakoff's declaration as to Russia's policy in the Eastern war, and that the English Government had resolved not to allow even the temporary occupation of Constantinople by the Russians.

AN attempt was made, on the 24th, to cross the Danube at Rutschuk, which proved unsuccessful, and was followed by a severe battle, in which the Turkish gunboats took part. The Town of Giurgevo, opposite, was set on fire by Turkish shells.

DOMESTIC.

FOUR tramps were killed and one fatally injured by the giving way of the walls of a long-disused limekiln near Bridgeport, Pa., on the 20th. They were sleeping on the broken furnace.

THE non-treaty Indians in Idaho Territory began hostilities on the 15th, and several settlers were murdered. Col. Perrer, with his command and some volunteers, subsequently engaged the Indians at White Bird, and were repulsed with the loss of about thirty men and several horses, after about three hours' fighting. Additional troops were called for on the 20th, and Gen. Howard, at Lapwai. The disaffected Indians numbered from 1,000 to 1,500.

ON the 21st, eleven of the Molile Maguire conspirators of the Pennsylvania coal regions, convicted of murder, were hanged—six at Pottsville, four at Mauch Chunk and one at Wilkesbarre.

THE body of Mary Ella Harrington, abducted from East Boston nearly a year ago, has been recently found in the Merrimac River, six miles from Lowell, Mass. The body was bound with rope in the smallest possible compass, sewed in sacks and weighted down.

SURSCRIPTIONS were being started in the principal cities throughout the country, on the 21st and 22d, for the relief of the suffering citizens of St. John, N. B. The entire business and large part of the residence portion of the city were burned over. Thirty dead bodies had been recovered from the ruins up to the morning of the 22d, and as many more persons were still missing. From fifteen to twenty thousand people had been rendered homeless, and most of them were entirely destitute. There was great need of immediate assistance.

A DISPATCH was received, on the 21st, by the Secretary of War, from a committee of citizens of Deadwood, D. T., stating that the Indians were raiding the Valleys of Bear Buttes, False Bottom and Whitewood—killing ranchmen and driving others to Deadwood for safety. The committee say they must have military protection at once, or the agricultural interests of the Black Hills must be abandoned. It was stated, by a Washington dispatch, that Gen. Sherman would leave, on the 28th, for the Black Hills and Yellowstone region.

THE Washington Daily Nation of the 21st contained an editorial in which it was stated that dispatches had been received there privately stating that if the insult to Joseph Seligman could be possibly construed as an entering wedge to the prosecution of the Jews in America, the Rothschilds would withdraw from the Syndicate and oppose American credit in Europe. The Jews also said the Secretary of the Treasury had dominated the course of Judge Hilton toward Mr. Seligman as unwarranted.

A SCRANTON (Pa.) dispatch of the 22d states that Patrick Golden, aged eighty-three years, had been brutally murdered in his own house at Nicholson. He was sitting with his wife, in the parlor, when a masked man entered with a double-barreled gun and fired two shots at Golden, who died shortly afterward. The murderer escaped.

A SAN FRANCISCO telegram of the 22d says the situation in Northern Idaho is exceedingly gravity my Indian outbreak of earlier days, but it will tax the best resources of the Government and of the people immediately interested to smother the Indians and restore peace to the country. The citizens thereabout in Oregon were organizing volunteer companies and asking for Government arms. In the raid on the settlements on Salmon Creek the Indians killed the men, but spared the women and children, and allowed them to be taken under escort of friendly squaws to Slate Creek, which had thus far been left undisturbed. At Slate Creek the whites had fortified themselves in a stockade. The Indians had expressed their determination to take the fort and murder the men.

A SPECIAL from Mauch Chunk, Pa., on the 24th, says the Mollie Maguires had murdered William O'Connor, near White Haven, and also assassinated John Grady, a miner employed in one of the Lehigh collieries, and James McDermit and Michael O'Brien, who were witnesses against several of the executed Mollies, had mysteriously disappeared, and fears were entertained that they had been foully dealt with.

A SIXTH attempt was made by four men, on the night of the 22d, to rob an express car on the Lake Shore & Michigan Southern Road, near Ligonier, Ind., but the event had been anticipated, and four detectives secreted in the car came to the assistance of the messenger, and after a desperate fight, in which the pugilistic skills on the train also participated, the robbers were scattered. Their names were Lallo, Billman, Hathaway and Conley, all of Ligonier.

A SEVERE and destructive wind storm visited St. Joseph, Mo., on the night of the 23d, untooling several houses in the center of the city, and blowing down walls, trees and fences. Several persons were more or less injured, but none fatally so far as known.

A HORRIBLE murder was committed near the Village of Gore, seven miles from Columbus, Ohio, on the 23d, the victims being John Weldon, a thrifty farmer, his widowed sister, Mrs. Susan McClung, and her daughter. The object of the murderers was plunder. Two men, named Joseph King and Wm. Terrell, were arrested for the crime, and the latter made a confession throwing the principal part of the crime on to King, who denied all knowledge of the affair. It was thought Terrell did most of the horrible work.

THE Chief of the Ordnance Bureau at Washington has given orders for the issuing 1,000 stand of arms to the State of Oregon, and 500 to the Territory of Idaho and 500 to Washington Territory.

A FIRE in Marblehead, Mass., on the 25th, destroyed over seventy buildings, including every shoe factory but five in the town. Fifteen acres were burned over, being nearly the entire business district of the town. Loss over $500,000. A large number of persons are thrown out of employment by the burning of the factories, and many families are homeless and rendered nearly destitute.

TWO HUNDRED Mormons arrived at New York on the 25th, from Europe, en route for Salt Lake City.

THERE was a severe wind and rain storm swept over portions of Northern Missouri, Iowa, Northern and Central Illinois and Southern Wisconsin, on the 25th, doing considerable damage to property in many localities—uncooling buildings, uprooting trees, blowing down fences, signs, etc. The rain fall was so heavy in some sections as to produce a miniature deluge. Near Kankakee, Ill., the passenger train from Chicago for Cincinnati was blown clear off the track, the engine alone remaining on the rails. One of the seven cars was lifted on to an embankment six feet high, and all were turned over on to their sides. Of the 137 people on board the train, only six received serious injury, no one being fatally hurt. Much damage was done in Chicago and to the shipping in the harbor.

PERSONAL.

CONSIDERABLE excitement has been created at the East because of the exclusion of Joseph Seligman, a prominent New York banker, from the Grand Union Hotel at Saratoga, on the ground, it is alleged, of his being a Jew. His brother, Jesse Seligman, stated on the 24th that he thought it very unlikely that any measures would be taken to institute proceedings against Judge Hilton under the Civil Rights act. What he wished impressed upon the public was the fact that this was not a personal controversy between his brother and Judge Hilton. His brother was excluded from the Grand Union Hotel on the ground that a rule had been made excluding all of his race. Judge Hilton is reported to have said that he had done what he conceived to be his duty in the protection of the interests of the property in his charge; there was a class of people whom he would not have in the hotel, and he had a right to say so.

IN a letter to Mr. G. W. Childs, of Philadelphia, dated London, June 6, ex-President Grant says: "I appreciate the fact, and am proud of it, that the sentiment I am receiving are intended more for our country than for me personally. I love to see our country honored and respected abroad, and I am proud to believe that it is by most all Nations, and by some even loved. It has always been my desire to see all jealousy between England and the United States abated, and every sore healed. Together they are more powerful for the spread of commerce and civilization than all the others combined, and can do more to remove the causes of wars by creating mutual interests that would be as much endangered by war."

PRESIDENT and Mrs. HAYES, together with Secretary Evarts, Attorney Devens and Postmaster-Gen. Key, left Washington, on the afternoon of the 20th, for Boston.

ROBERT DALE OWEN, the noted author and Spiritualist, died at Lake George, N. Y., on the 24th, aged seventy-six years.

FORTY-SIX Jewish firms in Cincinnati have signed a pledge that, in view of the discrimination made against Israelites by Judge Hilton, of New York, in excluding them as guests from the Grand Union Hotel, at Saratoga, they will henceforth entertain no relations whatever with the house of A. T. Stewart & Co., of which Judge Hilton is the acknowledged head.

POLITICAL.

AN official opinion has been given by Secretary Sherman, and approved by the Cabinet, to the effect that the 4 per cent. Government bonds now in the market will have to be paid, principal and interest, in gold, in accordance with the provisions of the laws in force on the 14th of July, 1870, when the bonds were authorized.

THE Secretary of the State of New York stated, on the 21st, in defense of Att'y-Gen. Fairchild's action in the case of Tweed, that while the statement was under consideration information reached the Attorney-General that Tweed had to his credit in European banks, and that he was only employed in one of the Lehigh collieries, and James McDermit and Michael O'Brien, who were witnesses against several of the executed Mollies, had mysteriously disappeared, and fears were entertained that they had been foully dealt with.

What he wished impressed upon the public was the fact that this was not a personal controversy between his brother and Judge Hilton. His brother was excluded from the Grand Union Hotel on the ground that a rule had been made excluding all of his race. Judge Hilton is reported to have said that he had done what he conceived to be his duty in the protection of the interests of the property in his charge; there was a class of people whom he would not have in the hotel, and he had a right to say so.

IN a letter to Mr. G. W. Childs, of Philadelphia, dated London, June 6, ex-President Grant says: "I appreciate the fact, and am proud of it, that the sentiment I am receiving are intended more for our country than for me personally. I love to see our country honored and respected abroad, and I am proud to believe that it is by most all Nations, and by some even loved. It has always been my desire to see all jealousy between England and the United States abated, and every sore healed. Together they are more powerful for the spread of commerce and civilization than all the others combined, and can do more to remove the causes of wars by creating mutual interests that would be as much endangered by war."

PRESIDENT and Mrs. HAYES, together with Secretary Evarts, Attorney Devens and Postmaster-Gen. Key, left Washington, on the afternoon of the 20th, for Boston.

ROBERT DALE OWEN, the noted author and Spiritualist, died at Lake George, N. Y., on the 24th, aged seventy-six years.

FORTY-SIX Jewish firms in Cincinnati have signed a pledge that, in view of the discrimination made against Israelites by Judge Hilton, of New York, in excluding them as guests from the Grand Union Hotel, at Saratoga, they will henceforth entertain no relations whatever with the house of A. T. Stewart & Co., of which Judge Hilton is the acknowledged head.

POLITICAL.

AN official opinion has been given by Secretary Sherman, and approved by the Cabinet, to the effect that the 4 per cent. Government bonds now in the market will have to be paid, principal and interest, in gold, in accordance with the provisions of the laws in force on the 14th of July, 1870, when the bonds were authorized.

THE Secretary of the State of New York stated, on the 21st, in defense of Att'y-Gen. Fairchild's action in the case of Tweed, that while the statement was under consideration information reached the Attorney-General that Tweed had to his credit in European banks, and that he was only employed in one of the Lehigh collieries, and James McDermit and Michael O'Brien, who were witnesses against several of the executed Mollies, had mysteriously disappeared, and fears were entertained that they had been foully dealt with.

MICHIGAN STATE NEWS.

WILLIAM ROBERTS, colored, was taken with cramps while bathing at East Saginaw, on the 19th, and drowned.

A FEW evenings ago, Harrison H. Reed, a Grand Rapids furniture dealer, entered the grocery store of Crawford Bros. for the purpose of collecting a bill. There was some misunderstanding, and high words ensued, which soon came to blows, resulting in Reed receiving a severe beating at the hands of the two brothers. It transpires that Reed's injuries were of a much more serious nature than at first supposed, he having received internal injuries. The Crawford Brothers are prominent business men, and one of them is a member of the City Council.

JAMES HICKS, eighteen years old, was killed by lightning at Negaunee, on the 18th.

THE annual regatta of the National Association of Amateur Oarsmen will be held at Detroit on the 15th and 16 h of August.

A. LEUCHNER, the defaulting Treasurer of the East Saginaw Savings Bank, has been a second time arrested for embezzlement, and held to bail in $1,200.

THE Republican Convention for the new Twenty-third Judicial District, composed of Alcona, Alpena, Iosco and Presque Isle Counties, was held at Harrisville, June 14. On the second formal ballot Reuben Z. Roberts, of Harrisville, was declared the Circuit Judge, and the nomination was subsequently made unanimous.

CHARLES BLANCHARD was drowned in the river, at Bay City, on the night of the 18th. While rowing up the river with a friend, he suddenly plunged into the river.

AN election case of general interest, recently decided by the Supreme Court, is that of John W. Jochim vs. Cornelius Kennedy. These two gentlemen were opposing candidates for City Treasurer in Ishpeming at the recent election. The total number of votes cast was 700, of which 380 were for John W. Jochim, 18 for John Jochim and 302 for Cornelius Kennedy. Half all the Jochim votes been counted, Mr. J. would have had six majority. In the Circuit Court Judge Grant ordered a recount, but there was no other Jochim in the city and that these votes were all unquestionably for one man. Judge ruled that such evidence would not be admissible, and the case was appealed. The Supreme Court held that where there was no other Jochim but the candidate, the votes cast for Jochim alone should be counted for John W. Jochim, and therefore he was elected Treasurer of Ishpeming.—Leading Resorts.

O. F. BOOTH, formerly Treasurer of the North Shore Boom and Publishing Company, was arrested at Allegan, on the 20th, upon the charge of embezzlement. The original arrest was founded on the affidavit of one of the corporators.

EDGAR SPENCER was recently drowned at Bay City, while bathing. He jumped from the boat into the water, and the current being very strong he was unable to save himself.

LESCHNER, the East Saginaw defaulting bank-teller, was arraigned, on the 21st, on three charges of embezzlement. He pleaded guilty to all of them.

TWO large barns at Cadillac were burned on the 19th, having been set on fire by tramps. The loss was $3,500.

JOHN BOYES, at Caro, Tuscola County, was injured on the night of the 20th. Loss $2,000.

HENRY GANS and Rosanna Schneider, of the Township of Bloomfield, were married on the 21st. The party next morning thirty miles, and were followed at the sound of the fence, then wheel in wild affright and dart back toward shore, and so aimlessly extend themself, while the water is constantly growing more and more shallower. At last he lies hopelessly stranded. None have ever been known to break through the barrier and escape. The boxing and transportation of these big fish to New York is a great labor, and it often takes thirty strong men several days to get one of the monsters into its traveling case. One in his big water box so big poured over the backs and blow-holes of the imprisoned whales every five minutes. That water-pouring, by the way, is a monotonous and tiresome job, which must be continued without intermission during the next ninety days, while the whales are being carried by schooner to Québec, thence by rail via Montreal and Albany to New York. The whale which Hughes hit must not cover their blow-holes, else, as they have not room to move, they would be unable to breathe and would soon, consequently, drown; yet they must be kept constantly wet. So their boxes are tight only as far up from the bottom as their eyes. Above that line there are cracks for the surplus water to flow off, and a man is told stand over them that they can be get into a tank, dipping from the river whilst, in the schooner, or from a hogshead when in the cars, and drenching them all the time.

THE census returns of Sweden and Norway for the close of 1875 have just been published. The former has a population of 4,382,291, and the latter of 1,817,847, making the total population 6,200,528.

PERSONAL AND LITERARY.

—Jenny Lind is fifty-one, and her boss Olaf little baby is three months old.

—Jefferson Davis, by a recent decision, has secured the title to a Mississippi plantation formerly owned by his brother.

—The chief affliction of George Francis Train is his many ideas and two inadequate English language.—Rochester Democrat.

—Jenny Lind says few other people like her husband, but she does, notwithstanding. He is so true and self-sacrificing.

—Prof. Winchell, of Syracuse University, is the Methodist Quarterly, declares himself a convert to the theory of evolution.

—The Sheriff has put his relentless grip upon the Philadelphia Saturday Evening Post, one of the oldest literary papers in America.

—Representative Alexander H. Stephens recently arrived at his home in Crawfordsville, Ga., somewhat tired from his long journey, but not otherwise the worse for it.

—He was apparently in better condition than when he left home last winter, and said that he felt quite as well as he did then.

—Sarah C. Gregg, of Texas, married against her father's consent. The parent, being rather more obstinate than sensible, smoothed away his domestic infelicities by killing the unwelcome husband, then the Sheriff, in attempting to arrest the parent, killed him; and, finally, the girl killed herself.

—It is related of Thomas H. Benton, that a gentleman, whose guest he was, went up in his room on the morning after he had made a speech, and had on his toilet but one boot. "Why, Colonel," exclaimed the host, "I knew all about it, sir," replied Benton, with great dignity. "I wrote it all myself."—N. Y. Evening Post.

—Frederick Lauer, Esq., has at present in his possession an original manuscript letter of the great reformer, Martin Luther, dated the year 1542. The letter is written on a half sheet of paper, note size, and is in a well preserved condition. The manuscript is bespoke, and the signature "Mart. Luther, D." is written in a good bold hand. There is no doubt as to the authenticity of this letter, written in the dialect of the German language current during the sixteenth century. The signature and chirography have been compared with other manuscripts of Dr. Martin Luther in existence, and have been declared to be an exact resemblance.—Reading (Pa.) Times.

—About the time when James and John Harper set up for themselves, their younger brother, Wesley, also wished to become a printer. The father removed from Newtown to New York, so that the sons might all have a home with him, and Wesley was set at work in the office of his brothers, at first as a compositor, his forte proof-reader. All the time his father charged him for his board, somewhat to the boy's surprise, for his father had no special need of the money. Soon after the close of age, the reason of this appeared somewhat suddenly. "I think you should go into business soon," said his father. "Any time you have been paying me for your board for six years has been saved for you. It shall be your capital to start with." With this Wesley Harper bought into the firm, becoming an equal partner.

—A man was fairly killed out west—Deadwood, in the Black Hills, by a stroke of lightning. The man's name was Coates Kinney—a man who was once a journalist of rare ability, but who became a strolling and an outcast by some misfortune. Will the surprise be all who read or sing when we inform such that this man—Coates Kinney—the victim of a thunderbolt in a far-away, wild and desolate spot, was none other than the author of the sweet and tender little poem, commencing with the verses:

Where the liquid shadows hover
Over all the starry spheres,
And the melody of motion
Thrills weeks in raising hears,
What a joy to be the listener,
Till a rantagon has her bed,
And a billion in the system
Of the soul can entertain.

What poem on the shades
Has so strong a hold on the heart,
And a thousand recollections
Bring it to the memory?
And a thousand busy fancies
Weave around its haunting spell?
As we listen to the mother
Of the soft, old-time lullaby.

HIDING THE BABY.

Build him close, and closer hold him,
Ah, but this is home to-night!
Bring his pretty clean and fold him
From the cold Main going by What! Old Bess—you cannot guess?
Not the cold Jack of the Sea.
Now he sounds my lovesome,
Can be half so old as he.

Could we only safely and blind miss,
To some polaic, chilling tide,
Where the sun could never find him,
This Old Man should surely go.
We would steal it his strike away
(Ghosts should grow about our feet)
And he should not take to-day
From us while to-day was sweet.

Gipsy ways he has most wisely
Taught us, and we gladly learn.
Wandering, stealing, yet serenely
Keeping something out of sight.
From our trees the fruit he shakes,
Silver lace on shawls he makes,
Only leaves little to leave.
This and other things he does.

Here he comes with nods that wither;
Here he comes with nods that blight;
Pretty Playfellow, Sister, Mother,
Just to take them by and by
He must find room in the night.
Though can mould put out the moon—
He can see without a light.
He will take the baby soon

Head with gold enough about it
Like to bring a thief to thought;
As what shall we do without it?
Children, you must help me out.
Still no better way appears
We can hide the baby so,
That the Old Man goes the way
He can never, never know.

There is one place, one place only,
We can hide him if we must
Very still and low and lonely
We can cover him with dust—
Such a wild rose at his head!
Thus the Man can understand.
Cannot take from us the dead.
—Mrs. S. M. B. Piatt, in Harper's Bazar.

IN HIS OWN TOILS.

Tom and I were only brothers. Our parents having died when we were quite young, left us little beside their blessing, and, about the time I attained my majority, we had struggled on together through misfortune and adversity, looking forward hopefully to a happy and successful future. Our lonely place in the world had strengthened an early affection, and, at the time of which I write, we had become a source of curious shape, and, as suddenly as it they had been waiting for us, two men in the garb of mariners passed on the other side. They let down the drawbridge with much clanking of chains and creaking of timbers. Its rheumatic joints seemed to cry out with the pain motion occasioned them.

Carrying my burden as carefully as possible, I passed over the bridge and through the gate into the court-yard. Once inside, I was surrounded by creatures of every description, and, finally getting irritated, I said: "Why don't one of you gaping fools tell where to take this person, he is seriously injured?"

"Hurt! Injured! Ha, ha, hi, hi," and they capered roundme, laughing in shrill, piercing tones. I looked in vain for a reply for an explanation of this ghastly encounter, when, to my amazement, he slid from my arms and, in a jiffy was hanging and dancing about me with the others. He whose leg I supposed was broken, they brought ale and wine to, and I thought too weak to walk, was capering about me, carrying his ankles with an incessant somersault. In a moment the truth flashed upon me. I could account for the request that I should not examine his leg, and his cunning, devilish smile. I had been led into a trap in a very large mouth, containing a few scattered teeth, worn to the gums and blackened, completed the picture. His hands were yellow, wrinkled and dirty. The finger nails were talon-like. His whole "make-up" in fact, was by no means surprised, but I began at once to suspect that I had aided him. And yet how could I have refused to help a fellow-being so seriously injured? I was suddenly aroused by his sharp voice: "Stop. Now turn to your left."

This I did, when, to my utter amazement, the green leaved trees had vanished, and in their places stood barren trunks and withered limbs. All about us, on the ground, were myriads of faded leaves. Just beyond was a clearing, with not a blade of grass to be seen. The blasted grounded looked as though it had been singed. In the center of the clearing stood an old, dilapidated mansion, once chinked and lived. Turret and battlement, court yard, huge gates, said a beauty, commanding appearance. All these features could not doubt my senses; it was real. I had stopped, in my wonder and perplexity, and made a step or two forward in astonishment at the old pile, when I was suddenly made aware of the presence of the old man by a sharp pinch on my arm, and the words:

"Why don't you go on?" impatiently.

"Is that your home?" I asked, still staring in a mechanical sort of way.

"Of course it is. Why don't you go on, and not stand staring like a fool?"

"They told me at the hotel," said I, moving forward, "that this island hadn't a dwelling on it, and was entirely uninhabited. I can't reconcile what I heard with what I now see."

"They must have been mistaken, sir!" said he, with one of his devilish laughs.

This time I was not mistaken. There was some hidden meaning in his laugh. Whatever it was, it gave me a very positive dislike to the old man. Having reached the shore of the moat, I asked him how we were to get across. For an answer he blew a shrill whistle upon a key of curious shape, and, as suddenly as if

The thriving City of St. John, N. B., numbering a population in 1871 of nearly 29,000, and about 12,000 additional in the suburb of Portland, was visited by a terrible conflagration, on the 20th, and by far the larger portion of the city was completely wiped out of existence. A dispatch of the 21st summarizes as follows:

"The entire business portion of the city is destroyed. Not a leading establishment has escaped. All the principal dry goods stores, the leading grocers, all ship brokers, commission merchants, all the wholesale liquors, flour, provisions, coal, salt, lumber, tea and West India goods are utterly wiped out. Forty old blocks, or nearly 200 acres south of King street have not six buildings remaining. There are no regular postal headquarters in the city proper. Every street, square and alley is filled with furniture, and thousands of people are without either food or shelter. The International Company's steamer New York sheltered and fed 1,000 persons last night, and vessels in the stream have large numbers of people on board. Thousands had to get away from the lower part of the city by boats.

"The fire commenced in a building, owned by Mr. Fairweather, on the south of York street, about 200 feet from the Dock, Smith's boiler-shop. The flames spread to the various buildings on Howe's Wharf, which were quickly consumed, and then the fire broke out with a roar, into Smith street, carrying everything before it. From there the flames spread into Dreper lane and Mill street, following that into Dock street. Here the fire was so high as to be almost beyond reach, and the flames were then upon their own way.

"A building on Hazen street had hardly become prey to the flames when others on the other side followed. In half an hour all that the German street saw of the square was in ashes. The Victoria Hotel and St. Andrew's Church were in great danger, and the hotel guests, as well as employees, began to make preparations for seeking new quarters. Very little time was given them to collect their valuables, and in a majority of cases the inmates had to leave with scarcely wardrobe. About the same time St. Andrew's Church took fire and was speedily consumed.

"The buildings at the southern corner of Dock and Union streets, and on the opposite corner, caught almost simultaneously and the fire spread along the western part of Mill street, crossing over to the opposite side, and igniting Larkin & Sons' biscuit manufactory, then following rapidly toward South street. From South Wharf the flames entered into Ward street and extended to Peter's Wharf in a remarkably short space of time, carrying everything before them. Then they proceeded to Water street, and from thence soon made their way to the southern part, the Market Square, making a jump up to Prince William street. At this stage, a wood-e house on Canterbury street took the flames, and Church street buildings were soon imperiled. Then the flames advanced to Princess and King streets and on Germain street, and the front of Trinity Church began to take fire very rapidly. The Academy of Music was also destroyed.

"The fire entered King street on the western side from Germain to Canterbury streets, extending near thereby on Chester street to St. John Hotel, burning Trinity School in its course, went up the south side of Laing's Square, leveled to the ground the Lyceum, destroying the marble works of S. P. Osgood and Messrs. Milligan, proceeded to Robertson's stables, across to St Malachi's Hall, up Limeker street, and then back to King street and down nearly to Pitts. From there all the buildings south of King street have been burned.

"In the other part of the city the conflagration was stopped about North street, having extended as far up Union street as Messrs. J. & T. Robinson's.

"A great quantity of goods saved fell into hands of thieves, who eagerly availed themselves of any opportunity to attempt to carry off what they could lay their hands on.

"The following newspaper offices were completely swept away: Freeman, Evening Globe, Daily Telegraph, Daily News, Watchman, and Religious Intelligencer. The Globe, Telegraph, News, Intelligencer and Watchman had job offices attached.

"The following are among the list of public buildings burnt: The Postoffice, Bank of New Brunswick, City building, Custom House, Maritime Bank Building in which are this bank, that of Montreal and Nova Scotia, offices of School Trustees, etc., Bank of Nova Scotia, Academy of Music, Victoria Hall, Odd Fellows' Hall, No. 1 engine house, Orange Hall, King Street Temperance Hall, King Street East Temperance Hall, Methodist Church, Dramatic Lyceum, Victoria School House, Temples of Honor Hall, Barnes' Hotel, Royal Hotel, St. John Hotel, Acadia Hotel, Brunswick House, Bayview Hotel, International Hotel, Wiggins Orphan Asylum, and the Deaf and Dumb Institution.

"The churches burned are Trinity, St. Andrew's, Germain Street Methodist, Germain Street Baptist, Germain Street Christian, Duke Street St. James, Leinster Street Baptist, Centenary, St. Phillip, Carmarthen Mission, Methodist, Pitts Street Mission, St. David's Reformed Presbyterian, Sheffield Street Mission House.

"Several persons are reported to have lost their lives in the fire, and many officers are still missing.

"Accidents were quite common, in particular among the brave firemen.

Ten of China and of India.

Sir W. H. Medhurst, in his last Consular report from Shanghai, recently laid before the Commons, states that the tea trade of that port showed again in 1875 a marked decline. The competition of India increases. Fifteen years ago the growth of tea in India was regarded as an experiment, but the export from Calcutta reached 25,000,000 pounds in 1875, and now it may almost be thought that, unless there be some change in the mode of cultivation or packing, it is only a question of time when China will be ousted from the field. The total export of tea from China was 242,000,000 pounds in the season of 1874-5, or four millions less than in the preceding season. The increase in the demand for tea in Great Britain has heretofore been supplied both China and India, but the returns for 1876 show 155,967,182 pounds of Indian tea imported into the United Kingdom from China, but that 's 15,000,000 pounds less than in the preceding year; the imports from British India—28,126,854 pounds—shows an increase amounting to 2,842,000 pounds.—London Times.

SEVENTEEN HUNDRED women have petitioned the Legislature of Massachusetts to confer upon them and their sisters the right of suffrage.

Strength.

"That is the best rope in my store," said a dealer in cordage, pointing to a not very large rope which lay coiled up on the floor.

"In what way is it best?" I inquired.

"In strength," he replied.

A friend to whom was presently pointed to a much larger rope near by, saying that it must surely be much stronger, for the size was greater.

The man of rope then went into a description of the process of manufacture, and that different kinds of rope, from a minute line up to the largest hawser. His explanation was so clear, that we readily saw that a cable could be nearly as strong as to the amount of manilla it contained per fathom, as to the close union existing between the fibers, or, in other words, that a pound of manilla made into a loosely twisted rope, one foot long, would not be so strong as the same amount of material closely twisted; or, more properly, a loosely twisted rope, weighing a pound to the foot, would not be nearly so strong as a hard twisted rope of the same material and weight—and yet the loosely twisted, weak rope would look the largest of the two.

A familiar example of this is shown by the shoemaker, who untwists his hempen thread when he wishes to break it. This untwisting does not reduce the thread of single fiber, and yet it is so weakened that the thread, which before almost defied human brute force to break in naked hands, will now part with such ease, that it can hardly be called breaking, very few of them being strong enough to require quite exerting. Its strength depended more upon the close union of the fibers than upon their individual strength.

It is not unusual to find persons who, like the rope-dealer's friend, look upon size and strength as synonymous. This impression is much more general than some would suppose. We frequently hear people speaking of some unusually large man, saying, "Just look at him; I would not like to have him take hold of me." Or of a church, "It is a very strong church—over three hundred members." Corporations are judged in the same manner—the number and wealth of its members being taken as the standard of its strength; and yet the fallacy of this is apparent to any one who will take the trouble to examine the facts of the case. Great size does not always indicate corresponding strength. Even in physical contests the largest does not always prove the best man. That this is true of individuals, probably no one will dispute. Yet many who acknowledge this are unwilling to apply the same line of reasoning to societies, to whom it is certainly more applicable than to individuals. Probably many of these same false theories could readily be overthrown with the same ease that one does false theories could readily be overthrown with the same ease that one does false weights in packing, and the petty economies are not attempted which a Chinaman will employ at any cost. His beloved taxation also is heavy. In India the trade is free, and though hardly only with a light export tax. The Chinaman is not keeping his place in the race. Our Custom-House returns for 1876 show 155,967,182 pounds of tea imported into the United Kingdom from China, but that 's 15,000,000 pounds less than in the preceding year; the imports from British India—28,126,854 pounds—shows an increase amounting to 2,842,000 pounds.—London Times.

Learn a Trade.

There is one lesson which we hope the present time will so deeply engrave upon the minds of all parents that its impression will never be effaced. That is, the necessity of teaching boys some trade, and making them thoroughly conversant with it.

The flood of men who are wandering aimlessly about the streets of all great cities, seeking with weary feet employment which will provide for themselves and families even a meager support, contains surprisingly few mechanics, of men who have been trained up to any regular trade requiring skill and practice. It is made up mainly of men who in their youth were "smart" young men, who thought they knew too much to tie themselves down to the drudgery and unpleasantness of any shop. They would be "genteel" clerks, clothes from a clean shirt every day, and adopt some light, "genteel" employment, which they could follow without serious effects upon their clothes or hands.

These men have drifted around, clerking in a fifty-dollar store at a small salary, run a cigar stand, perhaps did some indifferently good book-keeping, copied papers, or done any and all of the thousand and one things involving no more special labor, brains or experience, which are possible in our complex system of trade. As long as times were flush they succeeded pretty well in satisfying their comparatively small wants and desires. But hard times came, running in different directions, with some few surprises by their attendant satellites. Thus our society is split into factions. And so completely is this "untwisting" sometimes done that societies composed of hundreds, or even of thousands, are often broken in two with as much ease as the shoemaker breaks his thread. Surely the strength of the family, society, association, community, State or Nation, depends upon the close unity existing between the individual members.—Peste.

An Hour in the Detroit Police Court.

"When I was in Mexico," said Bijah, looking out of the window, "I saw it rain just about this hard for fourteen consecutive days."

There was an awful silence for a minute, and then a vagrantish looking old man, who was stooped to go and scrape tooth-ache drops, spit on his hands and said:

"I also used to live in Mexico, and I remember that shower. That was nothing, however, to one you have probably forgotten. It began one Monday morning and continued right along for twenty-eight days. I was then living on a ranch with my wife and family, and for until it finally stood forty-eight feet deep all over my ranch."

Bijah looked at him with scorn and contempt, and sarcastically inquired:

"How did you escape?"

"I climbed a pole forty-nine feet high," was the quiet answer. "I got my feet wet, of course, but we managed to put up with some discomforts in the awful world."

The old janitor was so mad that he couldn't make a bet for the drinks on trial—no cure, no pay. He says he'll be a rather die of toothache than to patronize a man who would tell such a lie. The corrosponding editor seems to be of the same opinion, as he only smiled faintly at the story.—Detroit Free Press.

Mont Blanc.

George Hatfield and Wife occupy a woodline shanty in Potstown. They were seventy-dreaming when the woman awoke with a start and a groan, and informed her husband that it was raining, and that the wind had been chasing the party sofa in the back yard and left it out there. He got up. His anger got up, too. He got downstairs to mut the sofa smoking wet, and he hunted up the ax in the dark, and with nothing around him but an old bombazine to support him, and had up and laid up an article of furniture costing fifteen dollars. The wife came down, and it was time for the party to get under cover. She alarmed the neighborhood and raised the police.

"Did you want your husband punished?" asked the Court of the wife.

"I—I—that is——" she stammered.

"Because if you do, you will be disappointed. Do you think I'd get out of bed at midnight to fall over chairs, rub my nose against doors and haul a sofa in out of the wet? Never! I'd lying to that bed like a dog to a bone, and that sofa might float to Constantinople and back for all of me. I've been roused up to bring in clothes off the line, to chase cows out of the garden and to put down windows, but I didn't rouse worth a cent. You are the one to blame, Mrs. Hatfield. Your husband is discharged, and if you have to sit on the table instead of a sofa it's no one's fault but yours."

FATHERLY ADVICE.

A girl of twelve who was found romping the streets at a late hour was brought out to be taked to. His Honor kindly said:

"Child, it is not your fault that you are here. Your father was down town, your mother gadding around, and the house seemed lonely for you. I know scores of mothers who are setting just such examples for their daughters. Home is the last place to keep them. They neglect their children, neglect their homes and forsake their husbands for the purpose of gadding. They learn home as soon as they have swallowed a miserable breakfast, tramp the streets for hours, and go home to bring their evil with them and ill-feed. It is the same with girls. They gad to the library, to the stores, to the ferry-boats—anywhere to get away from home. Why, sir, how can I blame you, a child of my own, when I know of such church-members in this city whose daughters are in some two hours a day, and who are allowed to walk the streets until two o'clock in the morning? There are a thousand homes in this city made wretched for hard-working husbands by young fathers because wives and mothers prefer the streets to their own rooms. It won't be long before any three-line item about Hottentots, your nose will be poked into trashy novels, and I'll be thinking of puppets dressed in green and an Icelander panting for a bottle of camphor, place it near the mouths, so as to inhale the fumes while sleeping.—Old Housekeeper, in Chicago Daily Commercial.

—I once helped a man to drive some fat cattle to market, who, just before starting them, gave them all the salt they would eat, to make them dry; and just before he reached the scales he passed a brook where the cattle drank a good many pounds of water, for which he received pay, which was no better than stealing. He was always selling about others cheating. He never bought a pound of sugar but what he said, perhaps it was half sawdust—and everything else in the same way. —Statement before a Kansas Farmers' Club.

—At the very critical time of the starting of the fruit of plums, cherries, apricots and peaches, before which manure dressings will be found more beneficial far more so than heavy dressing of manure during the growing or autumn. For it is evident that the principal reason why stone fruit falls off at this time is because the plant cannot supply nourishment equal to the demand, and this liquid food be applied just in the condition and in the necessary proportions and times thus progressing require. Without this liquid manure, from the great evaporation at this time of the year, only a small amount of nutriment found by the soil by the slow progress of the feeders in search of it, therefore freely falls.—Guide to Good Farming.

Attention to the Exterior.

It is an old saying that "before a man starts out to borrow money he puts on a clean shirt," and there is principle and good in a majority of business affairs. If a man wishes to keep his credit good he must make some show for it, as few persons feel inclined to lend or help those who do not try to help themselves. With this position the priest instructed the groom that such was to be his fate, truthfully telling him that a man should be respectable if he would secure his good opinion. If a man dresses in rags and goes about with a look of misery and poverty, more for the purpose of his failure than one who neglects such simple matters.

How one doubts the effect of external appearance upon values in market or elsewhere, let him try sending butter to market in an old weather-beaten firkin, another low good the butter or cheese the vessel may be inside. If this does not suit, try some stained and dirty eggs, or half-plucked poultry. Producing a good article is one thing, but selling it to advantage is quite another, and the good salesman generally makes the best money of the two. This brings to mind a farmer who was driving his cattle to market for obtaining better prices than his neighbor whenever he has a colt, horse or cow for sale. In fact, he always gives a reason for purchasing stock from others and selling it again at an advance; and some of his friends declare that he is quite successful in shrewdness in making bargains. He is certainly shrewd, but it principally consists in the value of a good looking exterior. He says that a few minutes' work with a comb and brush will suit fit per cent. to the value of a horse or a cow in the eyes of ninety-nine buyers out of every hundred, and so do not think he ever sells a horse without grooming it. This is a principle is potent in any branch of trade, and in every grade of society; therefore, it be too important to be overlooked or passed unheeded.—N. Y. Sun.

Surgical Treatment of a Horse.

THREE weeks ago a gentleman of this city purchased a fine high-bred mare in Boston, and as she was being led to the depot in that city she became frightened and started at full speed, coming in contact first with a horse-car and next with a doctor's chaise, and fell with great violence upon the pavement, rolling over here league upon the top of the head which spilled out brad. A Prussian physician, who was in charge of the equine race, was consulted. Upon making careful examination of the wound he was satisfied that some foreign substance was keeping the wound open, and, in order to remove it, it was necessary to make a large incision in the brain. When it was found to be a part of the skull fractured and driven in upon the brain, the physician made a large hole in the top of the head, through which he succeeded in removing a splinter of bone, which was found to be about the size of a man's thumb. This was removed by a strong pair of dental forceps, and it was found necessary to cut away the superficial and callous tissue around the wound, which was then syringed out with carbolic acid, and after dressing it was sewed up. The animal made no resistance, but kept perfectly quiet, except a slight nod of the head when the chisel was struck. It appeared as if she thoroughly comprehended what was being done for her relief. She is now recovering.—Providence Journal.

A Brave Japanese Lady.

The Nichi Nichi Shinbun, a newspaper printed in Japan, has the following:

"On a certain day quite recently a lady of very respectable appearance attended the sentry at the ——— Department by walking unceremoniously into the portion where he was on guard. Such an unusual occurrence led him to arrest the footsteps of the fair one and inquire who she was and what was her business. The lady replied with well-bred gentleness: "I am the wife of Major ——. Since my husband married in the battlefield, I have received no tidings from him, but I have heard a rumor that he was killed while fighting against the enemy in Formosa. My anxiety led me to inquire from every one I met, but I thought could inform me whether the report was correct or not, but I have not heard anything trustworthy. Knowing that Gen. ——— would be able to tell me I have come hither. He will you kindly say to him that I am here without delay, bring a woman. The guard was more astonished than ever, and immediately complied with the lady's request. The General remarked that he was very sorry the lady had come, but it was of no use endeavoring to keep the bad news a secret any longer, and ordered the sadder confidence in her presence. After the customary formal ceremonies had been given and received by the bearer of bad intelligence to the lady. But it is quite true that Mr. ——— was killed in battle on ——— day." The lady, on hearing this, was for a moment overcome with emotion, and bent her head to the floor in silence. Soon she raised her cheeks. But she soon recovered her equanimity, and looking in the General's face, said: "Well, I married a soldier. I knew that possibly this might happen some day, and was therefore not altogether unprepared to receive the sad news. But when you told me I could not restrain my tears, for indeed he was a very kind husband to me." She then requested her sorrow at interrupting the General when he was so busy, and thanked him for according her such a favor. Having learned all he lady was then going away, but suddenly thinking of something, she returned to her seat and, addressing the General, said: "As I was so much excited by the news of my husband's death, I quite forgot to ask you an important question. Will you be so kind as to tell me how he met with his death?" Oh, yes," said Gen. ———, "he ——— fought most bravely on the battle-field, as may be recently concerned from his character. On the day when he was killed, and the last time he was seen leading his men to the charge a ball struck him on the right side of his chest and came out at his left shoulder, and he fell mortally wounded. However, on that day he behaved with so much courage and determination that the insurgents and Imperialists were equally astonished at his courage.' 'Oh! I run so very glad

This is upon the plan of a coal kiln, and if one wants pay for his labor he can just cut the fire at the proper stage, and make a few bushels of charcoal. If not, he can let the whole thing burn to ashes. One who has tried this plan says it is a perfect success. It is worth a trial.

—Cold in the head can be cured at once, it taken care of at the very beginning. At night have a handkerchief saturated with a few drops of camphor, place it near the nostrils, so as to inhale the fumes while sleeping.—Old Housekeeper, in Chicago Daily Commercial.

The Chicago Tribune says: "A cent and a half is now the rate per bushel on corn from Chicago to Buffalo, and it has sickened every Chicago vessel owner. It is said that with an up-cargo of coal at 60c, the round trip can be made to bring a margin, but none of the betting owners would wager any shekels to that effect. A few disgusted holders of vessel property predict a still further decline to 1c per bushel." Not much like the palmy days when 18 and 20 cents were asked and paid.

Dom Pedro of Brazil is now astonishing the London people with his ceaseless activity. No Yankee ever moved about and dodged in and out at livelier pace to see and make a note of whatever is to be seen. At home, Dom Pedro is said to be the most accessible of sovereigns. On a certain day in the week he receives at his palace in Rio anybody who chooses to come. His visitors await him in a long gallery, through which he walks at a given hour. Each explains his business, and the Emperor, who rapidly seizes the points of each recital, responds briefly in the language of the person who addresses him. He has a long memory, and he is never known to promise anything which he does not fulfill. It is related that when the Legislative Chambers wished to raise the amount of the Emperor's personal budget, Dom Pedro refused it, afraid of too heavily weighting upon the revenue of his country.

THE new schooner Fleetwing has received her lower sails, and expects to sail to-day with a cargo of bark.

MCLEOD is erecting a slaughter house on the south bank of the river below the Boyne place.

IT is universally conceded that the success of our fourth of July celebration was solely due to the perseverance of R. Miller, Esq. He is just the man for such enterprises.

DENTAL.—Dr. J. H. Morgan, of Grand Rapids, will be in Charlevoix the 23d, to remain two weeks. He will come prepared to do work in his line. Dr. Morgan is an experienced and scientific dentist.

AT the Fountain City House are registered daily parties from Indianapolis and Shelbyville, Ind. Hon. A. B. Turner, and his two sons, of Grand Rapids are also here in search of sport.

NAT. STICKNEY, Esq., the harbor Contractor, left here Friday on the Fountain City for Detroit. From thence he will go to Godrich, Ont. He will return on the same steamer, Friday next.

THE CHURCH.—The work on the new Church, which has been suspended for some time, has recommenced. The cabin-ney is now being built, and the masons are putting on the second coat of plaster. There is little doubt that the church will be completed and dedicated this summer.

THE HARBOR WORK.—Dredging still continues in the river. They have a Channel of about seventy-five feet wide and eleven feet deep as far up as the fish house, and one cut will be taken out that depth clear through to Round Lake. Only about 9,000 of the 20,000 yards to be dredged now been taken out, and there yet remains money enough to dredge the channel at the mouth to at least 100 feet. The cut through the river will take off the point at the bend to high water mark.

THE INSPECTOR.—The progress of the work has confirmed the opinion already formed in our mind that the Engineer department struck just the right man in their selection for Inspector of our harbor work. Mr. Nettleton has carefully guarded the interests of the Government and the work, and the contractors may rest assured that they have an honest man to deal with. Mr. Nettleton has displayed good judgement in giving directions as to the manner of prosecuting the work.

Lemons at Carpenter & Bartholomew's.

Large stock of smoked shoulders and hams just received at our store. Fox, Rose & Buttars.

GRAND LARCENEY.—In June last Geo. Walker moved from Canada to this county. From his goods,—which were landed here and transferred to Norwood dock—he missed a chest containing tools and other articles. Lately visiting the premises of Logrango Lamphear, of Norwood, he indentified a clothes line as being one of the missing articles. He thereupon swore out a search warrant searched the premises, and found ten articles which he asserts were in the chest. On the return of the warrant before Justice Clark, of this place, the court considered the evidence sufficiently strong to instruct the sheriff to keep the articles in his custody until further action. On Saturday Lamphear was arrested on a charge of grand larceny brought before Justice Miller, and gave bail for his appearance for examination to-morrow (Wednesday)

SUDDEN DEATH.—The schooner E. M. Stanton, of Kenosha, owned by W. H. Kearney, of this place, arrived here Tuesday morning. Her Captain, Peter Johnson, was taken sick on the passage from Milwaukee here, with diarrhoea and a billious attack, and not getting any better after reaching this port, he was yesterday taken to the residence of Chas. Johnson, one of the hotels being able to receive him. Dr. Hood was called in and did what he could to relieve his sufferings, but medical aid was of no avail, and he died at ten minutes past two o'clock this afternoon. Dr Calkins, of Fife Lake, was telegraphed for this morning, but as he could not reach here until evening, the order has been countermanded. Mr. Johnson leaves a wife and five children. Three sons were with him on the boat, and their grief at the loss of a dear father was a sad sight to witness, as they stood beside his dying bed. We did not learn as to whether his funeral would take place here or elsewhere.—Petoskey Democrat.

The following vivid account is taken from Col. Hoffman's reminiscences of two wars: "At the battle of Sedan Sheridan stood near Count Bismark. Toward its close he shut up his glass and said turning to Bismark said: 'The battle is won.' The Court replied that he should be glad to think so but saw no signs of it yet. In a minute or two the French gave way. Turning his glass toward Sedan, Sheridan observed: 'The Emperor is there.' Bismark answered that it could not be; that the Emperor was not such a fool as to place himself in that situation. Looking again, Sheridan said: 'He is there, anyhow.' He had drawn his conclusion from the immense staff he saw and the confusion reigning among them. Sheridan was right. The Emperor and staff were prisoners of war.

A foreign letter says that an old lady who took passage for Europe in one of the American Steamship Company's vessels in May, became so deathly sick all over when three days out that she was afraid she would die before reaching Liverpool; and sending for the captain, she endeavored to persuade him to turn, his ship arround and take her back home, and she wouldn't ask him to refund a cent of her passage money. The ungallant captain refused to turn back.

Newport has not always received Presidents as ceremoniously as she did Mr. Hayes the other day. When President Monroe first set foot there, a good old Quaker advanced, and with no ceremony whatever held out his hand with the greeting, "How does thee do, James? We are glad to see thee." And Mr. Monroe responded quite as simply.

A TRIP TO THE STRAITS.

A Historical Spot Visited—Also Mackinac and the Fort.

A favorable opportunity presenting itself on Thursday to make a short cruise of the Straits, we availed ourself of it, and right fortunate were we in being able to take passage in the favorite of the Lakes—the propeller Fountain City—At about 4 p. m. on that day we landed at which is the most southerly projection of the main land of the north shore, and is about six miles due east from Mackinac Island. The business aspect of the "point" is of a decidedly rum and molasses nature, but among the many saloons shine forth a few general stores which seem possessed of a lively business. On the north side of the small bay is the mammoth mill and outfitting business settlement of Hon. B. F. Stockbridge. The mill is supplied with logs from a considerable distance along the north shore, where they are hauled from their extensive pineries and skidded on the beach. From here to the mill they are towed in rafts by a large tug.

In 1676, the remains of Father Marquette, the French Jesuit Missionary, were brought from what is now known as Pere Marquette or Ludington, and deposited beneath the altar of his church at St. Ignace. Rude maps and drawings of the locality and church are now extant, showing that the sacred edifice was situated near the beach about midway in the bay, and it was here upon the farm of Mr. Patrick Murray, that the foundation ruins of the old church were lately discovered. On this spot we stood, where over two centuries ago the solemn high mass was intoned by the good priest, and the wild savages prostrated to the cross. Onduraste is the heart of the person who can stand here without a feeling of awe! Gazing upon these mementoes of the dim past, and following down the lapse of time to the present, what a volume of history crowds upon our bewildered mind! Two hundred and one years ago!

We were shown a ring bearing a crucifix, and other trinkets that were taken from the place. High esthetic dignitaries are now in correspondence with French Jesuits and it is expected that an excavation will be made the remains reinterred with imposing ceremonies and a lasting monument erected to the memory of the great and good traveler.

From a deep revery we were called back to the present age by the sonorous tones of the propeller's whistle, and we were soon steaming toward the not less historic island of where we arrived just before the sunset gun upon the parapet of the fort boomed forth a salute to the retiring orb. There before have we "written up" Mackinac and about the historical antiquity of the island we will say nothing. The old fort is the principal object of interest to the visitor, and thither we hied. Within two years $40,000 has been expended in new quarters for the officers, new laundry, magazine, etc., and the appearance of the post has materially changed for the better. We had the honor of an hour's interview with the commanding officer Col. Hough, a brave and capable officer who has seen much service since the war in aiding the futile efforts of Uncle Sam to quell the troublesome Indians of the far west. Col Hough is a very polite and pleasant gentlemen and we very much enjoyed listening to his idess upon all the leading topics of the hour

Major Bush, the company Commander we were also fortunate in being able to interview, and although on duty in escorted us throughout the grounds, and through the quarters. For neatness, order and system, the company quarters at mackinac excel anything we ever saw of the kind. It is a marvel and it is well worth visiting. Capt. Bush is a courteous and affable gentleman, of whom we were proud to form an acquaintance. We formed the acquaintance of several non commissioned officers, who also showed us every courtesy in their power.

We met many old acquaintances among whom were Dr. Bailey, J. F. Cahoe, and H. Lachance. Mackinac is losing none of her formerly earned prestige as a famous watering place, and the advance skirmishers of the annual army of tourists have already reached the rock terraced Island of the Straits.

DOMESTIC.

A Hartford (Conn.) dispatch of the 26th says the special examination for the examination of the life insurance companies, appointed by the last Legislature, having examined a large part of the assets of the Charter Oak Life Insurance Company, had certified to Commissioner Stedman that there was an actual deficit in the assets of the company of over $2,220,000; and also that there were questionable assets amounting to over $1,735,000. It was believed, however, that the policy-holders, under present circumstances, ought not to sacrifice their policies.

Advices received in San Francisco, on the 28th, were to the effect that Gen. Howard, with a force of about 500 regulars and volunteers, was moving forward to engage the Indians under Chief Joseph, who were encamped at the mouth of White Bird Creek, on the Salmon River, in Idaho, and whose strength was variously estimated at from 100 to 400 warriors.

The printers in the New York Tribune office struck on the 29th, the managers having asked a reduction in rates from forty-six to forty cents per 1,000 ems, and having refused to confer with the Typographical Union on more or two points. Now men were instantly put to work, and the Tribune claimed that it could get along without taking back any of the strikers.

On the 28th ult., near Plymouth, Mass., the steamer Lady of the Lake exploded her boilers, and eighteen persons were scalded—six fatally.

Several years ago Mrs. Sarah M. Vicfor was convicted in the Courts of Cuyahoga County, Ohio, of murder in the first degree, having poisoned her brother, and was sentenced to be hanged. Sentence was commuted by the Governor to imprisonment for life. Since that time Mrs. Victor has been confined in the Ohio Penitentiary. Growing weary of life under such circumstances, in January, 1876, she made application to the Courts in Columbus to have the original sentence carried out, on the ground that she had not consented to commutation. After hearing the matter under advisement for eighteen months, Judge Bingham, on the 28th ult., gave an opinion that Mrs. Victor is, in law, an escaped prisoner after conviction, and issued an order to the Sheriff for her delivery to the authorities of Cuyahoga County to await action by the Court of said county. An application was then made to the Supreme Court for leave to file a petition in error, which was granted, and a stay of execution of Judge Bingham's decision was ordered until the case could be heard finally.

The following is the official statement of the United States currency outstanding on the late Old demand notes, $6,386,260; legal-tender notes, $340,764,322; notes of 1863, $96,26, compound interest notes, $300,360; fractional currency, $30,408,137 84; total, $850,627,979.84. The total amount of silver coin issued to same date was $68,121,887, of which $11,381,538 was issued on account of currency obligations, and $21,140,081 in redemption of fractional currency.

The coinage reports from all the mints in the United States, except that at Carson City, Nev., state that the aggregate coinage for the fiscal year is $71,650,050, showing an increase over that of the last fiscal year of $14,000,000.

Severe tornadoes occurred in Illinois, Indiana and Pennsylvania, on the 1st, causing great destruction to life and property. The Little Town of Reddoun, near Cedarville, Pa., was almost entirely destroyed—twenty families were made homeless in a few minutes, their dwellings being razed to the ground. One woman was instantly killed, and five other persons were injured, two fatally.

The celebrated trotting mare Lady Thorne died at Trenton, N. J., on the 1st.

PERSONAL.

President Hayes and party were in Providence, R. I., on the 28th, where they met with a cordial and enthusiastic reception.

Forty six Jewish firms in Cincinnati have signed a pledge that, in view of the discrimination made against Israelites by Judge Hilton, of New York, in excluding them as guests from the Grand Union Hotel, at Saratoga, they will henceforth entertain no such men whatever with the house of A. T. Stewart & Co., of which Judge Hilton is the acknowledged head.

President Hayes and wife, accompanied by several members of the Cabinet, arrived in Boston on the 30 h. At different points along the route from Washington the party was met by large crowds of citizens, and the President was everywhere received with enthusiasm and returned thanks in brief remarks. The Attorney-General, Postmaster-General and Secretary of the Interior, who were of the party, shared in the honors, and were also called upon for brief speeches. On their arrival at Boston they found the city profusely decorated for the occasion. They were met at the depot by Gov Rice and other distinguished citizens, and were escorted to the Hotel Brunswick by the military and a large concourse of citizens. The scene along the route was a grand and imposing one, a perfect ovation attending the distinguished guests at all points along the line of march. In the afternoon a reception was given at Faneuil Hall, and in the evening a private banquet was given by Gov. Rice to the President in private parlors at the hotel, after which a concert in compliment to President Hayes was given by the Apollo Club.

The American Tract Society, at it meeting in Boston on the 29th ult., elected the following officers: President, William C. Chapin, Vice Presidents, John G. Tappan, Gen. Erastus Rikereler, Secretary and Treasurer, Arthur Tilman. The Treasurer, in his report, says the receipts of the Society for the past year from legacies, donations and royalties, has been greater than any previous year.

President Hayes has appointed Gen. William G. Lodue, of Minnesota, Commissioner of Agriculture.

L. Cass Carpenter, an United States Revenue Collector, at Charleston, S. C., was arrested, on the 28th, and held to bail upon the charge of "raising" State revenue warrants.

President Hayes and family returned to Washington on the 30th ult. from their New England trip. They will spend the heated term at the Soldiers' Home.

On the night of the 28th, at Cadillac, Edward Green slashed himself to the abd men three times with a large knife, inflicting very serious and probably fatal wounds. He was stopped by parties in an adjoining room before he could inflict anything himself. For some time he has been desperately in love with his landlady, whom he boarded with seven years. She rejected his advances, which caused the attempt on his life. He declares he will repeat it the first opportunity if she still refuses to marry him.

The Superintendent of Public Instruction has arranged to hold the State Teachers' Institute, provided for by the new Institute law, at Lansing, commencing Aug. 20, and continuing five days. The Hon John Hancock, Superintendent of Schools, Dayton, Ohio; President E. E. Hewett, of Normal University, Normal, Ill.; Prof. Robert Graham, Director of the M del School of the Oshkosh, Wis., Normal, and Prof. Jonathan Piper, of Chicago, Ill., have engaged to give instruction in the Institute. These men are among the foremost in the West in Institute work, and a profitable meeting may be anticipated.

Senator Ferry, of Grand Haven, is slowly recovering, but his brother, Mr. E. P. THE SENTINEL.

CHARLEVOIX, MICH.

WILLARD A. SMITH, Editor and Publisher.

Calling of a King.

EDITOR SENTINEL.—Dear Sir: From a little item of news that has lately arrived from Charlevoix it seems that some one from a distance—perhaps Mr. Henry A. Clisaney of Detroit, who we have been told some time ago, was about to write up a history of the Beaver Island Mormons—wishes to know whether James J. Strang the leader of the mormons there, claimed to be a king. As there is some misunderstanding about it seemingly, we shall give to all your readers what we know about it,—not by hearsay, but from the documents and records left us by the pen of Mr. Strang himself; which so far as making that claim is concerned, should be the end of controversy on the subject.

First, then, Mr. Strang did claim to be a king only to the Mormon people and upon the same principles, and the same only upon which Moses, Melchizedec, Elijah, Elisha, Noah, Enoch, Peter, Joseph Smith, and all the great and leading prophets of God claimed that office since the world began; namely by an appointment by revelation, and an ordination under the hands of Angels and as none of those persons ever proposed in any way to be King, only to those who after a proper investigation of his claims and character chose to receive him as such, so it was with Mr. Strang. By virtue of this ordination, he claimed to hold "the conjoint, kingly, prophetic and apostolic office" held by all the above mentioned personages, so that if anyone understands, or knows just what the characters, claims, and prerogatives, of those persons, and how they came in possesion of them, he knows just what Mr. Strang claimed to be, and the ground upon which he claimed it.

Mr. Strang claims that he received this ordination under the hands of the heavenly messenger, at the very moment in which Joseph Smith was taken away or assassinated by the mob, in Carthage jail, Illinois. At this time Mr. Strang was in Burlington Wisconsin; and from the church records we take the following:

1st. On the twenty-seventh day of June, 1844, at 5:30 p. m. James J. Strang was in the Spirit, and the angel of God came unto him, saying:

2d. "Fear God, and be strengthened and obey him, for great is the work which he hath required at thy hand. Go on in the hope and strength and falter not, and he will sustain thee, and thou shalt triumph, for the voice of the Lord, by the mouth Joseph will be fulfil.

3d. "And the angel of the Lord stretched forth his hand unto him, and touched his head, and put oil upon him and said, 'Grace is poured upon thy lips and God blesseth thee with the greatness of the everlasting priesthood. He putteth might, and glory, and majesty upon thee, and in meekness and truth and righteousness will he prosper thee.'

Paragraph 5 in the quotation from the book of the Law must not be understood as translated from ancient records but as part of a revelation to Mr. Strang to the church and incorporated into the chapter entitled the "Calling of a King."

And in the "Book of the Law," which Mr. Strang translated as he claims from ancient records, had among the forefathers of the present aborigines of this continent, descended from the house of Isreal, we have the following under the head of the "Calling of a King."

4. Moses was king in Israel; but the people kept not the law of God, and rebelling set up a false God and worshipped it. When God would make them kings to rule the earth, they despised his majesty and went after other gods. Men have everywhere rebelled against God; nevertheless the earth is his and the fullness thereof. The dominion it belongeth to him, and he conferreth it upon whomsoever he will.

6. He hath chosen his servant James to be king; he hath made him his apostle to all nations; he hath established him a prophet above the kings of the earth, and appointed him king in Zion, by his own voice did he call him, and he sent his angels unto him to ordain him." (Book of the Law, page 168 and 169.)

As Mr. Strang claimed to be Joseph Smith's successor, the above as an item of history would hardly be complete without a brief notice of a few of the revelations given through him in which provision was made for a successor.

"I have sent forth the fulness of my gospel by the hand of my servant Joseph Smith, and in weakness have I blessed him, and I have given unto him the keys of the mysteries of those things which have been sealed, even things which were from the foundation of the world, and the things which shall come from this time, until the time of my coming, if he abide in me, and if not another will I put in his stead." (Doc. and Cov. Sec. 34 Par. 4, given Dec. 1830.)

"But verily, verily I say unto you that none else shall be appointed unto this gift" (the gift possessed by a prophet, see revelation and translation to the church) "except it be through him" (Joseph Smith) "for if it be taken from him he shall not have power except to appoint another in his stead." (Doc. & Cov. Sec. 43, 2. given Feb. 1831.)

"For I have given unto him the keys of the mysteries and revelations which are sealed until I shall appoint unto them" (the church) "another in his stead." (Doc & Cov. Sec. 27-2. Sep. 1830.)

"The President of the Church, is also the President of the Council, is appointed by revelation." (Doc. & Cor. Sec. 99. —6 Feb. 17, 1834.)

"And this ye shall know assuredly, that there is none other appointed unto you" (the Church) "to receive commandments and revelations until he be taken, if he abide in me." (Doc. &, Cov. Sec. 43:—1. given Feb. 1831.)

The above extract taken from the revelations of Joseph Smith dating from 1830 to 1834, are among the plainest things in the English language; and show very clearly, 1st, that he was to have a successor. 2d. That, that successor must be appointed by revelation from God. 3d. That this appointment or revelation is to be made through Joseph Smith only, and 4th, that, none would be appointed to act as a revelator to the Church, until Joseph was taken away.

Mr. Strong being the only one who could produce such an appointment in the handwriting of Joseph smith which he says, he "carried and exhibited in thirteen states, constantly challenging and inviting investigation," as to its contents and genuiness, and though Bigham Young, and a few of his co-laborers, have taken every pains to make it appear a forgery and Mr. Strang an imposter, and (from what Mr. Strang says in his "Prophetic Controversy,") actually put men on his track to destroy him; no letter ever received by man is surrounded by more overwhelming evidences of genuiness than this. I cannot here introduce this evidence, but would willingly do so, if an opportunity were given. I will only add that while Mr. Strang teachings has been constantly in harmony with his claims, and with the revelations and teachings of his predecessor Joseph Smith, Brigham Young on the other hand has been as far removed from these things, as the East is from the West, or light from darkness. In 1844, after the assassination of Joseph Smith, when the enquiry, "who has Joseph left to succeed him," was upon every mormons lips, nearly, Brigham Young in a proclamation at that time to silence all enquiry upon that subject, says "Let no man presume for a moment that his (Joseph's) place will be filled by another," &c.

And again, "you are now without a prophet present with you in the flesh to guide you, but you are not without Apostles, Secretties and Elders" &c. (See Times and Seasons Vol. 5 page 628.)

I can give here but barely the headings on turning points of Brigimite teachings upon the successorship of the prophet Joseph Smith; suffice it to say that from 1844 to the present time, the teachings which the Salt Lake Mormons have had from him upon this, and many other points in relation to it, are a mere series of blunders, contriadictions and falsehoods.

The evidences of general thrift, progress, industry, and temperance, every where observed in Salt Lake City and neighboring towns so much noticed and commented upon by ladies and gentlemen passing through there, are not as many have supposed, due to the sagacity shrewdness, and ability of Brigham Young as a leader, but very much rather to the teachings of Joseph Smith which Brigham, and all the Nawvoo Mormons brought with them into that territory; without which neither he nor any of his associates ever would have had any character or standing as leading men. Exhibit of these things Brigham Young is a mere blunderbuss. Neither would Mr. Strang ever had any name as a leading man, notwithstanding his natural talents were of a high order.

I have committed so much to paper, not for those who "know nothing about these things, and care less," but for men of a very different stamp and turn who may wish to commit these facts to history, or place them in a comprehensive form before a reading and thoughtful public.

I have undertaken to do so, because I feel that I am in possession of facts, and documents in relation to these things, that are in the hands of but few, and that if I should remain silent the future would reprove me for so doing. I do so the more gladly, because I am satisfied that whether I live or die, sink or swim, this great question will not die out among latterday Saints, and that the sequel will bring to them and many others a glorious future.

Respectfully and Sincerely,
WINSFIELD WATSON.

A Sterling Vegetable Remedy
Which Eradicates
DISEASES OF THE THROAT AND LUNGS, DYSPEPSIA, GRAVEL, PILES, URINARY TROUBLES, NERVOUS DEBILITY, PALPITATION OF THE HEART, TORPIDITY OF THE LIVER, CONSTIPATION, SCROFULOUS AFFECTIONS, AND FEMALE COMPLAINTS.

For nearly a quarter of a century this sterling preparation has been effecting cures of the various diseases to which it is adapted, and thousands of persons, of perfect reliability, in all classes of society have borne evidence to its wondrous remedial efficacy.

As a remedy for diseases of the Throat and Lungs it has achieved a popularity rivalled by that of few proprietary remedies. Experience has shown that for those who are troubled with weakness of the Lungs it is the best possible protective against Consumption, and it may be relied on with certainty to eradicate Bronchitis, Asthma, Croup, Diptheria, and Soreness of the Chest.

Coughs of the most obstinate kind are speedily overcome by it, and since a simple cough is very prone to develop into serious inflammation of the Lungs, the early use of Dr. WISHART'S PINA TREE TAR CORDIAL is earnestly recommended, as it invariably prevents the further progress of the disease.

Dyspepsia, Loss of Appetite, Torpidity of the Liver and of the Kidneys are promptly overcome by this superb vegetable corrective, which not only regulates but strengthens the organs of digestion, as well as those of the urinary and biliary secretions. It imparts unwonted relish for the food, and, by promoting digestion and assimilation, enriches the blood, which is the natural motor of vital energy and nutriment to the system.

Dr. L. O. C. Wishart's Pine Tree Tar Cordial thoroughly regulates the Bowels, removes Blind and Bleeding Piles, banishes from the circulation dropsical and all other impurities, and effectually counteracts a tendency to Gravel. It also entirely obviates the weaknesses incident to females.

Dr. L. O. C. Wishart's Pine Tree Tar Cordial is no mere Placebo. It is a standard medicine, and has been repeatedly recognized as such by the press and members of the medical profession, who emphatically endorse the popular verdict long since rendered in its favor.

"DOMESTIC" PATTERNS

Dr. Schliemann.

At a banquet given by the Salters' Company on Monday, Dr. Schliemann, in replying to the toast of "The Visitors," gave the following details of his autobiography, showing how he was led to regard Homeric archæology as his vocation:

"The first impressions which a child receives remain for life, and I feel bold to say that the pick-ax and shovel used in the excavation of Troy and Mycenæ were both forged and sharpened in the poor little village in which I was born and educated. In that little village there was an ancient castle—a ruin of the Middle Ages, with mysterious passages in the walls, and an underground passage which was said to lead beneath a lake. There was, beside, in the graveyard, a huge row of flat stones, said to mark the tomb of a malefactor. The sexton and sacristan of the village declared that for centuries past the foot of the malefactor had grown out of the tomb, and that they had themselves cut it off with their knives, and had used it for cutting down pears from the pear-trees. There was, beside, a hill, surrounded by a fable and tradition and that the hill contained a golden cradle. I remember I have often insisted my father to make excavations in the hill to take out the golden cradle. Behind our garden was a small pond, said to contain a silver vessel. My father, though he did not know Greek, was a great enthusiast about Homer, and daily recited to us some verses from the translation by Voss. He thus inspired me with great enthusiasm for the exploits of Achilles, and Hector, and Patroclus, but to my great regret I heard from my father there existed no vestige of ancient Troy. When I was seven years old he gave me as a Christmas present the "Universal History," with a picture representing burning Troy, with its huge walls and great gate, from which Æneas hurries out carrying his father Anchises on his back, and leading his son Ascanius by the hand. After I got that history I no longer believed my father's statement that Troy had disappeared. I said, 'Here are the great walls; Troy must know better than you.' He tried to persuade me that it was only a fantastical picture; but I firmly believed that Troy still existed, and that it was only covered by the dust of ages. Thanks to Heaven, that belief has never forsaken me in the vicissitudes of my life. My enthusiasm for Troy was so great that, when I was ten years old I wrote as a Christmas gift to my father, in bad Latin, the history of the Trojan war. When thirteen years old, unfortunately, or fortunately, my family fell into great distress, and my father, instead being able to pay for my schooling, put me in a grocer's shop to sell half-penny or pennyworths of berries and butter. There I remained for five and a half years, but I did not lose my enthusiasm. I shall always remember that in 1837 a journeyman miller came into our shop, half intoxicated, and recited about a hundred verses from the 'Iliad,' which were in a Prussian dialect passing, who had sent him to school to make a scholar of him; he was ready for the University, but, because he once came drunk to school he was sent away, and his father to punish him put him as apprentice to a miller. That sonorous language made a profound impression upon me, and I wept bitter tears over my miserable fate that I, who in my early childhood had dreamed such extraordinary things, should be obliged to sell berries and butter by half penny worths. There appeared no chance of getting out of it, at last, after five and a half years, I escaped from the shop, and since then, in general, fortune has smiled upon me. The simple reason why dear wife I have been able to realize the dreams of my early childhood, and to reap the fruit of the seed which was sown in my soul in the poor little village with the old castle, and the hill with the golden cradle, and the tomb in the churchyard from which the pear grew every year. I thank you heartily for listening to me."—London Times.

The Russian Advance.

The crossing of the Danube by the Russian troops deserves to be recognized as one of the greatest achievements in modern warfare. By many military authorities the Danube River has been regarded as one of the first natural fortifications in the world; by some, its passage in the face of a well-fed army has been considered impossible. Not without considerable delay and vast sacrifice of life and treasure has the triumph been accomplished. But all these were to have been expected, and the Russians are to be accorded the honor of having successfully accomplished a most dangerous and difficult military feat. The almost simultaneous and successful crossings at Widin, Simnitza, Sistova, and other points have seemed to the Czar and his commanders a sure footing on Bulgarian soil, and a fair field to fight their way through the formidable barrier of the Balkan Mountains, past the important fortress of Shumla, and so onward to the gates of the Celestial City.

The importance of the occupation of Sistova and Widin in a strategic point of view cannot be overestimated, and the Russians now command the whole northeastern portion of the Danube. Such a success as this must not, however, be regarded as by any means a certain forecast of a speedy advance. The loose and careless manner in which the Turkish troops received their assailants may be accounted for in two ways—the commanding officers may have been surprised, which in regard to a wretchedly foolish, for a true soldier would rather be beaten than surprised, and the Turk is no carpet-knight; or it may be their policy to permit the crossing, reserving their grand stand for the mountains, with which they are familiar. Again it is hinted at by our London correspondent that the Porte intends to make a faint attempt at defense, thereby encouraging the Russians to advance on Constantinople in the fervent hope that England, growing alarmed at the unimpeded advance of the Czar, may oppose her cause, and attempt to turn the scales at the very moment of Ottoman victory. Should the Turkish fleet prove more powerful than we have believed to suppose, and be prepared to meet and even to drive the enemy back, the Russians, leaving the Danube in their rear, have, to a certain extent, very materially widened their line of retreat.

The country lying between the river and the ultimate point of attack, as may be seen by a glance at the map, is strongly guarded both by mountain pass and fortification. The Russians will, of course, lose no time in following up the advantage they have gained, and we may now expect to hear war news of a very much more exciting character than that to which we have grown accustomed during the past month. The grand, decisive battle of the war cannot be far off.—Chicago Inter-Ocean, June 30.

An Old Story.

Some months ago Frank Whittemore, an artist, courted a New York heiress by the name of Alice Carter. Her parents opposed the match and the twain eloped, were married and took up their residence in the vicinity of the metropolis. A few days ago she became a mother, her father relented and sent her a check for $1,000, which she indorsed and the wife's signature, got the money, abandoned her and the child and fled to Europe.

This is a striking illustration of marrying in haste and repenting at leisure. This pair young woman has now leisure to her sorrow that whether pursuing a knave or an honest man she lost her head for nothing swain than she ought, and that if she had followed the adage she would not to-day be in sadness.

The last act in this play of marriage was the most ingloirious. The father, learning of her desertion, threw open his door and shut out the fatted calf. She made up her mind to return, hit a Dr. Tabson, who had attended her, had an attachment issued against her property for the amount owing to him. They were seized on a truck-car at the Hoboken ferry, and conveyed to a station-house, where Mrs. Whittemore, accompanied by her father, appeared, and he paid the bill.

Nothing could be more sadly pursuant than this denouement; but it is safe to affirm that its lesson will be lost upon those whom it should serve. The young woman will continue to think of the artist, the silken ladder, the moonlight and the song of love. The nice young man will continue to appear when her parents are away, and will be regarded splendid, and especially her willing as a knight of the enemy. 9,000 or 10,000 men, had disappeared, leaving on the field about forty dead, 2,000 or 3,000 muskets and sabres, and their camp material, and baggage. But what was his astonishment on calling the roll to discover that he had not lost a man either killed or wounded. —In Chesterfield County, Va., there lives a pair of eccentric twins whom a local newspaper describes as follows: "Messrs. James and John Martin are twins, and have lived in the Skirmpartor neighborhood for these threescore years and ten. They are bachelors. One cannot be distinguished from the other in appearance, and it is said by those who know them that they are very eccentric. When brother James asks a man a question brother John repeats it, and when brother John takes a swallow of old rye brother James takes one too. They are honest and well-meaning, but plain and frugal in their habits. They came recently to Manchester in a wagon of old-fashioned build. It is the first time they have been seen two miles away from their home for ten years."

A Russian Bare-Devil.

Among the officers on the Grand Duke's staff is a tall, handsome man, with a lithe, slender, active figure, a clear blue eye, a large, prominent, well-shaped nose, and a face passing enough for a General Lafayette. It is Skobeleff, the youngest General in the Russian army, the conqueror of Khokand. He has the reputation, even among the Russians, of being a madman who would fling away his own life and those of his troops without the slightest regard for consequences. During the war which resulted in the conquest of Khokand, a Russian detachment of 800 men, with 400 Cossacks, was compelled to retreat before a superior force of the enemy. Gen Trotsky decided upon a night attack, and confided his plan to Col. Skobeleff, then his Chief of Staff. The latter entered into the idea with great enthusiasm, and proposed to lead the attacking column himself, and to take only 150 Cossacks. Skobeleff, having reconnoitered the ground, perceived that the Khokandians had encamped in a semi-circle, and that the Russians in an open plain, which gave every facility for the maneuvering of cavalry. At midnight he took his 150 Cossacks, divided them into three parties, and cautiously surrounded the enemy's camp. The party led by Skobeleff himself managed to pass the enemy's outposts, who were sound asleep. Then he gave the signal for the attack; he fired his pistol and, followed by his 150 Cossacks, ... rode headlong into the enemy's camp of 9,000 or 10,000 men, shouting and yelling like fiends, and cutting down everything in their passage. For a quarter of an hour the plain resounded with shrieks and yells, shots, the trampling of horses, shouts and groans, and all the uproar of battle. Then all was silence. Skobeleff assembled his Cossacks, and when morning came he found that the whole army of the enemy, 9,000 or 10,000 men, had disappeared, leaving on the field about forty dead, 2,000 or 3,000 muskets and sabres, and their camp material, and baggage. The Star Spangled Banner.

The Stars and Stripes have their centennial to-day, and it deserves notice perhaps as much as that of a battle, or a town settlement, or a meeting-house raising. At the beginning of the Revolution each of the Colonies here its own flag. Massachusetts her pine tree, and South Carolina —not her palmetto, which came afterward, but her crescent in a field of blue. The flag of Massachusetts waved over Bunker Hill, according to Trumbull's picture, which is better authority than any modern pamphlet. The following July Gen. Putnam hoisted the new red flag of Connecticut, with the State motto on one side and "An Appeal to Heaven" on the other, over headquarters on Prospect Hill. The pine tree on a field of white, with the last mentioned words on it, was suggested by Col. Read, Gen. Washington's secretary, for adoption by the army, and Washington very likely approved the notion, which was certainly better than that of the rattlesnake, which adorned the rattle and the same period. The merits of the rattlesnake were urged for the National coat-of-arms; it was exclusively American, totally wise and vigilant, never attacking first, and never surrendering after attack, and its rattles, while distant, were united, and increased in number. We don't know that the character of our people is nearly so good as the snake's, but he is a dead more picturesque. This, however, is aside from the flag.

The first flag thrown out by authority of Congress was not a National one, for it joined the union of the Thirteen States the crosses of St. George and St. Andrew on a blue field, to thirteen stripes, alternately red and white. This was at the first meeting of the committee which devised this flag, or rather borrowed it—for one nearly identical was used by the East India Company. This flag was raised in the camp at Cambridge, January 2, 1776, not in March Washington entered it and went with its folds. It floated above the Virginia Convention which declared the colonies free and independent States, it won the first salute for the young Nation from the Governor of one of the Dutch West India; and it is a question whether Princeton and Trenton were fought with it or with the new Stars and Stripes. The latter was ordered by Congress at the Philadelphia, and became her willing ... with his tender story. The experience of father and mother will frown upon his suit, and recommend their favorite, some unromantic plodder of an assured future, from whom the daughter will turn away. She will not listen to the plain speech of the parental choice, but will hang by the hour on the sweet words of her Almanzor, and will not believe that the stars and stripes are to be hers without the slightest regard for consequences. The Mark Detroiter.

There are some meek-faced and tender-hearted men in this City of Detroit. There is one in particular who owns a house and lot in the eastern part of the city. Another citizen, whose face doesn't betray meekness, owns a second lot next to him, and a few days ago he wanted to buy the meek-faced man out and build a factory covering both lots. The figures were too high, and he went away feeling mad and revengeful. Coming across a shoeman who wanted to set up his trade and exhibit a wild man and other interesting specimens of life and death, he gave him the use of the vacant lot. It was stipulated that a hand-organ should be kept going, bells rung now and then, and if the wild man uttered wild yells occasionally so much the better. When the meek-faced citizen saw the tent put up a few days later he crossed his face, and he made for a printing office. About the time the showman was ready to open doors to the curious public the meek-faced citizen was ready with his signs and sackhammer.

"Gentlemen, walk in and see the great Kickapoo kangaroo from Kalamazoo!" said the showman.

"Gentlemen, walk in!" and up went a sign on the fence reading, "Look out for bull, pen!" A second and a third followed, and the meek-faced man was putting up the fourth when the showman closed a bargain with a truck to move his shows to the vacant lot. He went over fifteen minutes later, and the meek-faced citizen sat on his door-step and mused:

"He who wants to sell out let him sell, and I wouldn't much sheal the ore!"—Detroit Free Press.

Beware of the Fatal Benzine.

EARLY yesterday morning a singular accident occurred at the residence of Mr. Charles H. Shoemaker, No. 1902 Swain street. Mr. Shoemaker was preparing to leave the city for the summer with his family, and to protect his carpets and upholstered furniture from moths, he sprinkled benzine over it. Then he went up stairs and while there the gas generated by the benzine exploded. Mrs. Shoemaker and Miss Hall, who were in the room at the time, were badly burned. They jumped out of the back window, Miss Hall going to the yard in the rear, and Mrs. Shoemaker to a neighbor's house opposite. Every stitch of Miss Hall's clothing was burned and her flesh scorched in a crisp, and at last accounts she was at the died from the effects of her injuries. Mrs. Shoemaker's burning clothing was smothered by Mr. Hall. Her flesh also was badly burned. During last night her agony was intense, and at one o'clock this morning was resting easy.

An examination of the parlor after the fire had been extinguished showed something else than the gas explosion to have been the cause of the flames. The window shutters were blown open, glass smashed and the sashes and frames of the windows knocked to pieces. The heat was so great that a small bronze figure was actually melted by it.

There seems no doubt that the accident was caused by the explosion of the gas arising from the benzine. There was no fire in the parlor, nor any in the dining-room immediately back; but in the kitchen, which connects with the dining-room, as the latter does with the parlor, there was a fire in the range. It is the theory of some that the gas in the parlor found its way to the kitchen and was ignited there.

Miss Hall was to have been married in a few weeks, also she was to tell the situation on Saturday to prepare for the wedding, but concluded to remain with Mrs. Shoemaker and during until they should leave for the country.—Philadelphia Telegraph.

Wild Horses in the Black Hills.

Passengers, firighters and others, in passing over the Bismarck route, report seeing, on Antelope Creek, on Big Meadow, between North Morrow and Grand River, a herd of genuine wild horses. The valley chosen by these horses for their home is one of the finest between Bismarck and the Hills. It extends a great distance along the course of the Grand River, and is about twenty miles broad. The soil is a rich loam, and is covered by a luxuriant growth of the finest grass, and is well watered. These horses, numbering quite a dozen, have been here for several months. They are fat, and their coats are glossy as though just combed by the hand of the groom. They are led by a monarch, an animal of extraordinary beauty, power and intelligence. These seem actually to worship this monarch, as they frequently approach the road within the distance of a few hundred yards, and, standing on some elevated spot, watch the passing stage teams, snuffling the air and capering proudly about. They have, in one of two instances, followed the stage several miles—always keeping, however, a respectful distance between them.

Numerous attempts have been made to capture them, but the swiftest and hardiest riders are selected for the chase, but the good black leader and his followers have so far shown them all the way, although, in several instances, the chase has been several miles long. In one case, the others having given up the pursuit, the leader, when, with an intelligence seemingly beyond the capacity of a mere brute, he himself took the rear, and forced them forward, as they swept swiftly up the valley and away into the Iron Mountain country. Where these animals are now conducting plowing is here the horse is that next day he has to be turned to pasture, probably for weeks. Another horse is furnished, and he is told the deficiency in the harness the day before. Rashly he determines that there shall be no deficiency in the harness to-day, so he buckles the upper strap tight, and the lower one loose, and goes to plowing. The day is not long passed, by choking, the horse gives out before the last rings for dinner.

Again, he is set to harrowing. He takes the harness he was using the day before hauling out manure. The hip straps have to be much shorter on a wagon than on a harrow. But he did not know or did not care, so he harrowed all day with the hip straps holding up the front end of the harrow. When he went out to work, he passed the gate so, but did not listen to it.—1876

Gentlemen's Summer Fashions.

The suits worn by gentlemen for business suits in town and for traveling and morning wear in the country during the summer months are of cashmere and irregular plaids, bars and checks. Brown suits are much worn, yet there is no decided preference for any one color, and there is the same variety of design and liberty of choice in styles that now prevail in ladies' dresses. For example but cut away coats and sacques that do not fit the figure are worn with these suits; and these coats may barely meet at one point, where they are fastened by but one button, and thence cut away, or else they may be fastened still lower down by two buttons, or by three. The only obligatory thing is that the entire suit—coat, vest and pantaloons—must be made from the same piece of goods. The collar of the vest is the absence of any collar, and the mode of fastening, begun entirely on the shape of the coat, with which the vest is usually worn. The pantaloons must be cut large, full and straight, just as they were last year.

Light dress suits for church, visiting and afternoon wear have look-cuts of diagonal worsteds, either black or dark blue. The best and most effective suit for any important change from last year's styles is that these coats are slightly shorter and with narrower lapels, instead of the extreme length then worn. The vest is of the material of the coat, or else a double-breasted one of black cloth is worn in very warm weather. All the full straight pantaloons are of mixed gray stripes.

For midsummer at the country resorts, navy blue suits of Scotch heather cloth will be preferred to the flannel suits of last year. They are made in the easy English styles described above for business and traveling suits.

There is no change in the full-dress suit of black broadcloth, except that the swallow tail coat is made a trifle shorter. For full dress at the watering places many gentlemen eschew this altogether, and wear instead a black frock-coat, with vest and pantaloons of white duck.

The duster for traveling and for driving is the English Ulster or Cary Pasha cloth or of gray alpaca. It is very long, and is belted like an Ulster coat, but is less elaborate. Many traveling coats are made in the same shape. Carriage robes used by gentlemen when driven are of gray linen, with stripes or of handkerchief-borders, jewelry, etc. Fancy vests with linen checks are made up in slender satin-back cassimeres. Basket-woven silks are preferred plain, plaid or grain. What are called lace scarfs are nice and cool for summer wear. They are gauzes and sea side grenadines woven in small figures, put together of cream-color, or else bars of blue or red with black lace-like figures between. Either is handsome. The blue, dark blue lea cere bars. These are worn with scarf rings.

In jewelry there is a fancy for modest little scarf-pins of silver representing a trident with shells, a wheel, fan, horseshoe, gun, a horn and bow, a sword, a pick-axe, helmet, or other simple device: in solid silver these cost from $2.50 to $6. Different buttons are worn with different vests; those for general wear are of faceted red gold or the dead-polished Etruscan gold. Sleeve buttons are solid gold linked together so that the cuff meets without lapping.

High-crowned dress hats are of silver pearl color on a willow frame that renders them porous and cool. The crown is slightly bell shape, and the brim has the round English curl. Price, $6. Business hats are pearl gray, in Derby shape, with crown and brim both stiff, or else a soft crown with stiff brim, price, $4.50. A novelty for a cool summer hat is the bell hat, with low rather solid brim drawn in front and back and narrow on the sides. Its special feature is a corrugated band inside ten rotulins, also holds in the crown. Price $3. The "bounce hat," as soft that it may be carried in the pocket, and only an ounce in weight, is of the finest drab or gray felt, with merely a cord for a band; price, $2.50 to $5. Straw hats of English split straw are made in sailor shape, with stiff brims and crowns. They are also stiff, or else of alternate striped braids—brown, black, or blue with white. The brims are double, and are of solid color underneath. Price $4. White cloth braids trim white sailor hats. Mackinaw rough straw hats are always worn. They may be all soft or all stiff, and cost from $2.50 to $10.

Gloves of drab, pearl or gray lisle-thread are worn with two buttons or else the bands at the wrist. English gloves have the inner gores of the fingers in contrasting colors.—Harper's Bazar.

It is customary for the managers of State and county fairs to offer premiums for the best specimen shown by young ladies and girls. Dr. Schliemann.

At a banquet given by the Saltars' Company on Monday Dr Schliemann, responding to the toast of "The Visitors," gave the following details of his autobiography, showing how he was led to regard Homeric archæology as his vocation:

"The first impressions which a child receives remain for life, and I feel bold to say that the pick and shovel used in the excavation of Troy and Mycenæ were both forged and sharpened in the poor little village in which I was born and educated. In that little village there was an ancient castle—a castle of the Middle Ages, with mysterious passages in the walls, and an underground passage which was said to lead beneath a lake. There was, beside, in the graveyard, a huge row of flat stones, said to mark the tomb of a malefactor. The sexton and sacristan of the village declared that for centuries past the foot of the noble tree had grown out of the tomb, and that they had themselves cut it off with their knives, and had used it for cutting down pears from the pear-trees. There was, besides, a hill, surrounded by a ditch; and tradition said that this hill contained a golden cradle. I remember I have often begged my father to make excavations in the hill to take out the golden cradle. Behind our garden was a small pond, and in coming a silver vessel. My father, though he did not know Greek, was a great enthusiast about Homer, and daily recited to us some verses from the translation of Voss. He thus inspired me with great enthusiasm for the deeds of Achilles and Hector, and Patroclus, but to my great regret I heard from my father there existed no vestige of ancient Troy. When I was seven years old he gave me as a Christmas present the "Universal History," with a picture representing Troy, which I copied in huge walls and great gate, from which Æneas hurries out carrying his father Anchises on his back, and holding his son Ascanius by the hand. After I got that history I no longer believed my father's statement that Troy had disappeared. I said, 'Here are the great walls, Troy must know better than you.' He tried to persuade me that I was only a fantastical picture; but I firmly believed that Troy still existed, and that it was only covered by the dust of ages. Thanks to Heaven, that belief has never forsaken me in the vicissitudes of my life. My entire career I owe to that book, and nothing has so much pleased me as when I was ten years old I wrote as a Christmas gift to my father, in bad Latin, the history of the Trojan war. When thirteen years old, unfortunately, or fortunately, my family fell into great distress, and my father, not being able to pay for my schooling, put me in a poor grocer's shop to sell half a penny's worth of pease, or rings and butter. There I suffered for five and a half years; but I did not lose my enthusiasm. I always remained sure that in 1837 a journeyman miller came into our shop, half intoxicated, and recited about a hundred verses from the Iliad.' He was the son of a Protestant pastor, who had sent him to school to make a scholar of him; he was ready for the University, but when once he came drunk to school he was sent away, and his father to punish him put him as apprentice to a miller. That sonorous language made a profound impression upon me, and I need hither tears over my miserable fate that I, who in my early childhood had dreamed about excavating Troy, should be obliged to sell turnips and butter by half pennyworths. There appeared no chance of escaping; but at last, after five and a half years, I escaped from the shop, and since then, in general, fortune has smiled upon me, and in company with my dear wife I have been able to realize the dreams of my early childhood, and to reap the fruit of the zeal which was sown in my soul in the poor little village with the old castle, and the hill with the golden cradle, and the tomb in the churchyard which the last sexton grew very year.' I thank you heartily for listening to me."—London Times

The Russian Advance.

The crossing of the Danube by the Russian troops deserves to be recognized as one of the grandest achievements in modern warfare. In many military authorities the Danube River has been regarded as one of the finest natural fortifications in the world; in some respects, its passage in the face of a wily foe was deemed impossible. Not without considerable delay and a vast sacrifice of life and treasure has the triumph been accomplished. But these were to have been expected, and the Russians have to be accorded the honor of having successfully accomplished a most dangerous and difficult military feat. The first crossing and most successful crossings at Wilitz, Nicopolis, Sistova, and other points have secured to the Czar and his commanders a sure footing on Bulgarian soil, and a fair field to fight their way through the formidable barrier of the Balkan Mountains, past the important fortress of Shumla, and so onward to the gates of Constantinople.

The importance of the occupation of Sistova and Wilitz in a strategic point of view cannot be overestimated, and the Russians now command the whole northwestern portion of the Danube. Such a success as this must, now, however, be regarded as by any means a certain forecast of a speedy and victorious advance. The loose and careless manner in which the Turkish troops received their assailants may be accounted for in two ways—the commanding officers may have been surprised, which we regard as exceedingly doubtful, for a true soldier would rather be beaten than surprised, and the Turk is no carpet-knight; or it may be their policy to permit the crossing, reserving their grand stand for the mountains, with which they are familiar. Again it is hinted at by our London correspondent that the Porte intends to make a stand attempt at defense, thereby encouraging the Russians to advance on Constantinople in the fervent hope that England, growing alarmed at the unexpected advance of the Czar, may espouse her cause, and attempt to turn the scales at the very moment of victory. Should the Turkish army prove more powerful than we have been led to suppose, and be prepared to meet and even to crive the enemy back, the Russians, having the Danube in their rear, have, to a certain extent, very materially weakened their line of retreat. The country lying between the river and the Balkans, full of attack, as may be seen by a glance at the map, is strongly guarded both by mountain pass and fortification. The Russians will, of course, leave no time in following up the advantage they have gained, and we may now expect to hear war news of a very much more exciting character than that to which we have grown accustomed during the past month. The grand, decisive battle of the war cannot be far off.—Chicago Inter-Ocean, June 30.

An Old Story.

Some months ago, Frank Whittemore, an artist, married a New York heiress by the name of Alice Carter. Her parents opposed the match and the twain eloped, were married and took up their residence in the vicinity of the metropolis. A few days ago she became a mother, her father relented and sent her a check for $1,000; her husband forged the wife's signature, got the money, abandoned her and the child and fled to Europe.

This is a striking illustration of marrying in haste and repenting at leisure. This poor young woman has now learned to her sorrow that her parents knew much more about her good-for-nothing swain than she did, and that if she had followed their advice she would not to-day be in sadness.

The last act in this play of marriage was the most ingloious. The father, learning of her desertion, threw open his door and killed the fatted calf. She made up her mind to return, but a Dr. Tuson, who had attended her, had an attachment instead against her person for the amount owing to him. They were driven on a truck-car at the Hoboken Ferry, and conveyed to a station-house, where Mrs. Whittemore, accompanied by her father, appeared, and he paid the bill.

Nothing could be more sadly pathetic than this denouement; but it is safe to affirm that its lesson will be lost upon young women. Indeed, it should serve. A woman will continue to think of the guitar, the silken ladder, the moonlight and the song of love. The nice young man will continue to appear when her young imagination is filled with this parental opposition, and he beguile her willing ear with his tender story. The experienced father and mother will frown upon his suit, and recommend their favorite, some unromantic plodder of an assured future from whom the daughter will turn away. She will not listen to the plain speech of the parental choice, but will hang by the hour on the sweet words of her Almaviva, and, in spite of the family influence, will marry him, eloping for the purpose, if necessary. Then, nine times out of ten, she will discover, when it is too late, that what she took for gold was only pinchbeck.

It's an old story, and will probably go on as long as the world lasts. The cacophony for love is something enormous in the feminine breast, and the adverse experience of others will not deter her, as a rule, from following the man of her choice, though he come from the regions of brimstone.—Washington Nation.

A Russian Barefooter.

Among the officers on the Grand Duke's staff is a tall, handsome man, with a lithe, slender, active figure, a clear blue eye, a large, prominent, well-shaped nose, and a face young enough for a Second Lieutenant. It is Skobeleff, the youngest General in the Russian army, the conqueror of Khokand. He has the reputation, even among the Russians, of being a madman who would fling away his own life and those of his troops without the slightest regard for consequences. During the war which resulted in the conquest of Khokand, a Russian detachment of 800 men, with 12 Cossacks, was compelled to repreat before superior force of the enemy. Gen Tcrakiev decided upon a night attack, and confided his plan to Col. Skobeleff, then his Chief of Staff. The latter entered into the idea with great enthusiasm, and proposed to lead the attacking column himself, and to take only 150 Cossacks. Skobeleff, having reconnoitered the ground, observed that the Khokandians had encamped within a mile and a half of the Russians in an open plain, which gave every facility for the maneuvering of cavalry. At midnight he took his 150 Cossacks, divided them into three parties, and cautiously surrounded the enemy's camp. The party led by Skobeleff himself managed to pass the enemy's outposts, who were sound asleep. Then he gave the signal for the attack by firing his pistol, and, followed by his 150 Cossacks, he rode headlong into the enemy's camp of 6,000 or 7,000 men, shouting and setting fire to tents and cutting down everything in their passage. For a quarter of an hour the plain resounded with shouts and yells, shots, the trampling of horses, shouts and groans, and all the uproar of battle. Then all was silence. Skobeleff assembled his Cossacks, and when morning came he found that the whole army of the enemy, 6,000 or 7,000 men, had disappeared, leaving on the field about forty dead, 2,000 or 3,000 muskets and sabres, all their camp material, and much baggage. But what was the astonishment on calling the roll to discover that he had not lost a man either killed or wounded. Mr. Macfarlane, who first met him on the banks of the Oxus, relates this exploit to show how much method there is in this apparently madness.—Cor. London Daily News.

The Star Spangled Banner.

The Stars and Stripes have their centennial to-day, and it deserves notice perhaps as much as that of a battle, or a town settlement, or a meeting-house raising. At the beginning of the Revolution each of the Colonies bore its own flag; Massachusetts her pine-tree, and South Carolina —not her palmetto, which came later—but her crescent in a field of blue. The flag of Massachusetts overlay Bunker Hill, according to Trumbull's picture, which is better authority than any modern pamphlet. The following July Gen. Putnam floated the new red flag of Connecticut, with the State motto on one side and "An Appeal to Heaven" on the other, over headquarters at Prospect Hill. The pine tree on a field of white, with the best mentioned words on it, was suggested by Col. Reed, Gen. Washington's secretary, for adoption by the army, and Washington very likely approved the notion, which was certainly better than the Kokandian rag encamped within a mile and a half of the Russians in an open plain, which gave every facility for the maneuvering of cavalry. Birds' Nests.

The best way to find nests is to watch a bird while building; in that way, moreover, you are sure to see them in their most perfect state, and to know when eggs are fresh. It requires patience; but you see the workers return again and again to the same spot, and a little observation usually completes your knowledge, though you may sometimes be deceived or puzzled by the curious instinct or reason of the architects. You will facilitate your work by scattering cotton wool, horsehairs, thread, string, worsted, and soforth over the fields, and you will soon see which they will attract the attention of the birds. About you. Put them on your lawn or on the piazza rails, and watch them. A robin comes to carry off the string, and, having used up what you have provided, and liking the material, makes a long piece wound round a stake, and supporting a gladiolus. By persistent effort he frees a part of it; but the hank that he pulls the rest, the tighter he ties the knot around the stake, and the string is becoming entangled with his legs. It fights twenty minutes and then gives it up. Sparrows pick up hairs and straws from the lawn, and warblers come to the vines for cotton wool, passing fearlessly within three feet of you; and then they come back to break off little twigs and to peel off shreds of dry bark from the honeysuckle. A pair of golden robins, the male with black and orange, the female with yellow and duller black, come for string, worsted and hair, but beware of them for they are thieves. Leave your knitting under the tree fears for five minutes, and it is gone; you will find it a week later, a part irrevocably woven into the hanging nest, and a part dangling with the needle in it. The weaving is so cleverly done that you wonder whether the orioles haven't used your needles. Not at all, madam; I defy you to produce with your implements such a piece of work as these birds have produced with their bills. Successful experiments have been made by supplying the orioles, in the tree where they are occupied, with bright silks and worsteds, which they employ altogether, if liberally provided so that a very gay and partly colored nest may arise in your orchard where you can see it from the house. Wilson says that an old lady, to whom he showed an oriole's nest in which a piece of dry grass, thirteen inches long, was passed through thirty-four times, asked him, half in earnest, if the birds couldn't be taught to darn stockings.—H. D. Minot, in Harper's Monthly.

An Historical Game-Cock.

The bravery of this bird and his really "game" nature is well known. From the Spaniards, especially, this has led to the pitting of them one against the other as a gambling amusement, when the Sirds are sure to fight, if pendited, until one of the combatants falls dead. We chanced to be in a circle lately where the nature of the game-cock was discussed, and where we heard related a historical anecdote illustrating the same, which we do not remember to have ever seen in print.

The occasion was that of the memorable naval battle which occurred June 1, 1794, when Admiral Lord Howe, the famous English Commander, gained a decisive victory over the French fleet, at which he captured seven ships of the line. These old-fashioned sea-fights were terribly bloody conflicts, and as there was no such military sway over in those days as now, but every seaman was expected in the maneuvering of a ship in action. Indeed naval warfare, at the period to which we refer, was, as compared to that of to-day, almost a totally different thing.

In this conflict between the English and French fleets, the ship of the line Marlboro was under the command of Capt. Berkley, son of the Earl of the same name, and who was promoted subsequently to be an Admiral. He was a brave and gallant man, devoted to his profession, and notwithstanding his high birth and blue blood, was a thorough sailor, and an excellent officer. On the occasion of this famous conflict he broke through the French line of battle between L'Impetueux and Le Jacobin, each of which was of superior force to the Marlboro, and gallantly engaged them both.

When Capt. Berkley was clearing his decks for action he ordered all the live stock to be thrown overboard, but at the humble request of his crew permitted them to retain game cock which had become a pet among them, and who had been an inmate of the ship in all her successful actions. Sailors are proverbially superstitious, and the cock attached considerable importance to the life of his bird, which ranged over the Marlboro from stem to stern at all times, and whose clear, shrill voice was welcome to the ears of the seafaring men who heard it.

At the action between the Marlboro and her two opponents, the scuppers of the British vessel ran with blood; the decks were literally piled with the dead and dying; half of her crew lay dead beside their guns, and scores were borne below to the hands of the surgeons. Still the undaunted, and sheets of death-dealing fame dashed over the combatants. Finally, the two broad pennants of the enemy were hauled down, and the Marlboro was victorious, and the sun arising from the horizon made the scene more horrible in its light. The cock was about one year old, and had been hatched some three months ago, in the German Catholic Bonifacius Cemetery. The unfortunate woman was confined at the station, and the dead child was given to the Coroner.—Chicago Tribune.

The Neck Detroiter.

There are some neck-faced and timber-hearted men in this City of Detroit. There is one particular who owns a homestead but in the eastern part of the city. Another citizen, whose face doesn't betray it, owns a vacant lot next to him, and a few days ago he wanted to buy the neck-faced man out and build a factory covering both lots. The figure were too high, and he went away feeling mad and revengeful. Coming across a shoeman who wanted to set up his tent and exhibit a wild man and other interesting specimens of life and death, he gave him the free use of the vacant lot. It was stipulated that a hand-organ should be kept going, bells rung now and then, and if the wild man uttered wild yells occasionally so much the better. When the neck-faced citizen saw the tent put up a board fence, forgiving smile crossed his face, and he made for a printing office. About the time the show-man was ready to open doors to the anxious public the neck faced citizen was ready with his signs and tuck-hammer.

Gentlemen, walk in and see the great Kickapoo kangaroo from Kalamazoo!" said the showman.

"Tack! tack!" and up went a sign on the fence reading: "Look out for small-pox." A second and a third followed, and the neck-faced man was putting up the fourth when the showman stood a stream of tobacco juice directly into the crinkle, underarmed and useless hands and fingers, and he went away to look for farmers. Oh! for more good, honest, faithful and skilled farm hands.—Detroit State Register.

Cutting Grass and Making Hay.

Although this subject has been discussed for a long time, as much as any other pertaining to farm economy, it is hardly thought that there is still a difference of opinion as to time and methods of cutting and curing in order to get the best results from hay. Generally it is, however, that a great change has taken place in the minds of a vast number of farmers with regard to the time of cutting grass within a quarter of a century. For a long time the common practice was to allow the grass to stand until a portion of the seeds were ripe, and could be rubbed out of the head, and the reason alleged for allowing the crop to become thus ripe was that then the hay would go further by feeding; that it would be longer, or, as it was sometimes expressed, "spend" better. There is no question that it would take longer to feed such hay than that cut while the grass is in full bloom (which is still held by an individual here and there) loses its juices in the cure, therefore more valuable than the grass containing the same amount of nutrition, and this point, as we have said, has been ascertained to be when the plant is in bloom.

But curing hay probably is quite as important, if all of the nutritive properties of the grass are secured (or as nearly so as possible), as is the proper time of cutting.

It may be said, without risk of much debate, that this matter receives more attention among farmers generally than it ought to, or than its importance deserves. It hardly need be said that the process of curing is one which requires judgment and skill, for it is well understood that to let it "make hay sunshine" is to allow the best portion of the nutrition of the grass to be washed out by rains, and the remainder left in the shade, or bare. The point to decide is, when the grass is cut, how to cure it in a manner to secure a necessary quantity of moisture to secure its palatable, and retain the largest portion of its nutritive properties. For the old method—and the one which a majority follow yet—is to expose it to the action of the sun and the drying wind, and then put either into cocks, or the stack, or barn. The point to decide is, when the grass is cut, how to cure it so as to evaporate

SUNDAY was an unusually busy day in our harbor. We counted six vessels at the mouth of the harbor at one time, some entering and some clearing. Considering the fact that commerce does not stop on Sunday, ought not the Township Board to provide for the raising of the bridge on that day? Under certain circumstances the Township might be involved in a bill of expense which would be annoying.

Mansfield, as engineer in charge of our harbor work arrived one day last week and relieved Mr. Nettleton, who has been temporarily in charge of the work. We are confident that Mr. Burke will see that the best use is made of our small appropriation.

TAR HARBOR.—The dredge has made a cut on the South side of the river to a point 100 feet above the fish houses, undermining the aforesaid sweet smelling edifices, as in accord with the recent order of the Board of Health. The intention was to take a corresponding cut from the point at the north side, but Col. Mansfield thinks the small appropriation will not warrant it. One crib will be placed this week and about sixty feet more of the bank on the South side of the mouth will be removed.

PERSONAL.—Mrs. A. J. Beardsley, of Boyne, arrived by Fountain City, Friday, from Port Huron, where she has been visiting her parents.

— Wm. W. Burke, U. S. Inspector and wife, are guests at the Fountain City House.

— The parents and married sisters of the lamented Gen. Custer, are sojourning at the Petoskey Camp Ground.

— Capt. Harrison Miller, of the Beaver Island Life Saving Station, has been in town a few days.

Rev. W. L. Tilden, of this place, goes to Fentonville this week to attend a family re-union.

— Messrs. Gunn and Cody, business men of Grand Rapids, are here fishing.

— N. Stickney returned here from Canada Sunday.

— Mr. F. A. Hull and wife, of Vermontville, are stoping at the Fountain City House.

—C. J. Pailthorp and H. O. Rose of Petoskey were in town yesterday.

HYDROMIC.—That august and all powerful body, the Town Board, has held a session, and the council of Three of the Spanish Inquisition never caused the common herd to quake as did the great aforesaid, the Town Board The Town Board stands erect, and in the full majesty of its authority notifies the Health officer that he must remove all nuisances from our midst instanter. And while the Dr. is nerving himself up to the performance of a task of prodigious magnitude the Board explain that pollution of our beautiful clear water must cease. that no more vaults, fish houses etc. will be permitted to remain upon the bank of the river or harbor. Therefore the Health officer has echoed the official mandate, and as the edict goes forth very much Dutch Swearing is heard among the fish shanties, and more than one of our citizens possessing water privileges are seen in their back yards with their overalls on looking for a good place to dig a hole, and damning up their chimneys and the Town Board in good style.

THE RIGHT AND WRONG.—A necessity which will soon confront the people of the lake portion of Charlevoix county will be the opening of the upper Pine River to a corresponding depth with the lower. It is an improvement which lies at the heart of our progress and development, and interests every tax payer—some more than others, but all in common. In short it must be opened. Simultaneous with this necessity will arise another,—the erection of a new bridge across Pine River at this place Upon whom the burden of this necessity should rest has been a matter of discussion since the bridge hall an existence. It may be said that the land highway is our own, and that to us belongs the duty of furnishing and keeping in repair the span. Let us analyze this argument. With all the natural resources, and extensive forest timber of Pine Lake and in Ann, what would to the situation of its people without a free navigation of the lower river? Now, what particular locality has done the most labor in the work of securing Statu and Government aid in its improvement? We answer, Charlevoix Village. And, in all enterprises aiming at the improvement of the upper channel Charlevoix village has done her full share, knowing full well that their neighbors of the upper lake received two fold benefit from the improvement. Therefore, coming home again to the present exigencies, we ask, who shall bear the burden of these two improvements alluded to in the outset? We reply, both sections should jointly put their shoulders to the wheel in both enterprises. It is unjust for Charlevoix to be compelled to build, keep in repair and tend to a bridge which is unquestionably the gateway to the homes and firesides of Pine Lake. For had it not been for the untiring and persevering labor of Charlevoix people no bridge would now be necessary. If, then, the people of Pine Lake people expect the Charlevoix people to aid them in their own work, they must have magnanimity enough to come forward and shell out their share toward maintaining the bridge at this place.

The worst enemy Ireland ever had has appeared in Dakota. It is the potato bug. This tourist from Colorado seems bound to "do" Europe, and has struck an elysium. A second St Patrick will be handy for Erin if he can drive out the bug.

TEMPERANCE AT ELK RAPIDS.—From the Progress we learn that John Lindsey was arrested, tried and convicted for selling liquor to Indians and other intoxicated persons, fined $300, in default of which he was taken to the Detroit House of Correction by Sheriff Acker, when he will remain for one year.

A Washington dispatch to the Chicago Tribune says "A private letter from abroad received here to-day from a distinguished officer who is a personal friend of General Grant says that the latter is taking deep interest in the present political situation here; that his sympathies are with President Hayes; and that among his friends he never ally speaks in support of Mr. Hayes, and approves and defends his policy. These declarations of General Grant to his friends are represented to be of a very earnest and cordial nature."

Sitting Bull has given his version of the Custer massacre. He stated that the battle lasted only thirty minutes, and that Custer with a few men and officers had cut through the Indian line when he turned and charged back. The Indians were bewildered by this unlookoffor desperate charge, but closed in on the few men and killed them all. Custer it is said, shot five Indians, and went down beating another with the butt of his revolver. This account corresponds with others coming from Indian sources.

Mrs. Allison, of Peninsular township, a woman of 88 years of age, is doing the entire house work for a family of ten persons, including washing, baking and ironing. Very few women of one third her years can accomplish as much.—Traverse Bay Eagle.

A WASHINGTON dispatch of the 5th states that the Postmaster-General had received a letter from E. W. Keyes, Postmaster of Madison, Wis., stating that four of five members of the Republican State Executive Committee were Postmasters, and inquiring whether their signature for a call for a State Convention would violate the spirit of the President's order. As the Convention could not be called by any other means, they hoped the performance of the formal duty above indicated would not be considered as a violation of the President's directions. The Postmaster-General replied that, although he would prefer each official should interpret the Presidential order for himself, yet he was of opinion that to merely provide for the meeting of a Convention, and to call it to order without attempting to organize it, or take any other action, would not be inconsistent with the spirit or purpose of the President's instructions.

AT a State Greenback Convention held at Portland, Me., on the 6th, the following State ticket was put in nomination: For Governor, E. F. Allis, of Milbwaukee; Lieutenant-Governor, E. T. Lieut. Bullis had captured a number of stolen horses, and was awaiting further orders from Gen. Ord. It is reported that the President and others in high official station expressed gratification with the intelligence received of the crossing of the Rio Grande in pursuit of depredatory Indians, and of the success of our soldiers' efforts in recapturing stolen property and punishing the marauders.

AT the Fourth-of-July celebration at Woodstock, Conn., exercises were held in South Carolina, and Senator Blaine, of Maine, spoke upon political topics, the former assailing the southern policy of the Administration, and severely condemning the President's course in his dealing with South Carolina and Louisiana. Senator Blaine spoke of Mexican affairs, assuming that war between the United States and that country was imminent, with a view of annexing a portion of Mexican territory to the United States, the speaker opposing the entire scheme as unwise and chimerical. He also alluded to and disapproved of the President's Southern policy. When Mr. Chamberlain had concluded his speech, the Hon. Mr. Eldridge, of Fairhaven Mass., stated that he believed the sentiments which the address did not represent the feeling of New England. He then stated for all those who desired to express their policy of President Hayes to signify it, and three hearty cheers were given for the President. Speeches then called for three cheers for Gov. Chamberlain, and they were lonely given. Mr. Wall, President of the Convention, then arose and stated that it should be understood that every speaker was personally responsible for what he said. As for himself, he had the abiding confidence in the integrity of President Hayes, and confidence in his policy.

AT the Cabinet meeting, in Washington, on the 6th, an informal discussion was held relative to the recent order of the President prohibiting Federal officers from participation in the management of political councils and conventions, and, while no formal action on the subject was taken, it was agreed that the recent letter of the Postmaster-General was a correct and judicious statement of the meaning of the order in regard to cases like the one presented from Wisconsin, and that the order should be firmly maintained and impartially enforced, there was no occasion to apply it to town officers, who were elected as members of the convention before it was issued, and who probably took their seats before it reached them by mail.

—Capt. Charles Brown, of Southport, Me., was placidly fishing in his dory, the other day, when he felt a "bite" which jerked him over the edge. His companion, however, caught him by the heels as he was about to disappear in the briny deep, and pulled him in, still clinging to his line; the two, after a protracted struggle, succeeded in landing the fish aboard, which proved to be a halibut weighing 130 pounds.

—A man by the name of Bast, in Cincinnati, put up his little girl's dinner, old. A young lady found the waif and cared for her tenderly for a week at great trouble, and finally discovered who her parents were, and borrowed a hat and other things to take her wee thing home in. He overtook some movers, and it occurred to him that they might have dropped it, so he asked if they had lost anything. An old gentleman in the party replied they had not, but that the same time asked his wife, who was in the wagon, to make an examination. The wife soon said their satchel was missing. Mr. Whitesides held up the one he had found, and asked if it was the one, and the old gentleman replied that it was, and that it contained $2,000. Mr. Whitesides deemed it unnecessary to make further inquiry, and delivered the snake contents to its rightful owner.—Bell County (Tex.) Journal.

—The Western woman doesn't go well. A burglar broke into the house of Mrs. Gray, of Kansas City, who was alone, and told her if she made any noise or attempted to give the alarm he would kill her. She was frightened, and did not speak or stir while he packed her silverware and jewelry for removal. Then by way of emphasizing a parting injunction not to raise an alarm, he forced her into a closet, and locked her there. Then by way of making a parting injunction not to raise an alarm, he locked her there. That made her so angry that she forgot her proper position of bed, knocked the burglar down with a chair, and, scratching his face, stamped upon him, and yelled at the top of her voice. A police officer heard the noise and rushed to the rescue of the prostrate man, and took him to jail in order to protect him from fatal injuries from the irate woman. It is a terrible thing to fall into the hands of such a heroine, and burglars should be careful.

—A Philadelphia special to the Chicago Tribune states that during the execution of "Big Bully" Maguire, murderers at Pottsville, Gov. Hartranft sat in the telegraphic office in Philadelphia by the side of an operator who maintained constant communication with the Pottsville office, while his (the Governor's) Private Secretary stood at the foot of the gallows with a reprieve in his pocket for Duffy, the last man who was hung. The reprieve was not used in case any of the condemned men had in their last speeches expressed a willingness to die game. Maguire who might divert the Elgin wealth from Donkeng, and hence an improper sort of a person. He said that Arthur's address was slow heading against the local opposition, and became finally wrecked on the "Centennial Association." Bessie assenting her information by a nervous laugh or sobbing, or under the circumstances, and always in such company as took away the responsibility from her feelings, and appeared very much frightened so early in the day. Indeed, all that Bessie said put the check with her hand, and then she was flitting miles away in Yosemite, leaving the unfortunate agent in a much worse predicament than if he had been rare for him at all, she yet, on this Fourth of July morning, before commencing herself finally to the purposes of the Association, felt constrained to declare once more her personal freedom, and so to fortify herself against further importunity.

The objective point assigned to Bessie was the Centennial Exhibition itself; and as New York intervenes between Philadelphia and Donkeng, so that in going from one to the other they never meet needs pass through the metropolis, and as Bessie intended to go and return the same day, it became necessary for her to make an early start. Special early and late trains were to be run that day, among them Donkeng, 5.30 a. m., the other leaving New York 6.30 p. m., and it was by these that Bessie for her departure and return must be governed in her movements. Taking, accordingly, the former, after some delays she reached the Centennial grounds at about eleven o'clock.

The day was hot, as everyone remembers, but the excitement was intense, and Bessie felt apart from her own pleasure as she was vindicating profound theory. She was thankful that she should be freed once from her fellow-travelers—especially of the male sex—and hence had compensated Prospect Hill police officer, a gentleman in the carto raise her window, which she was unable to do herself, and had nearly suffocated during all the journey. But this was but a trifling episode and even as her own cost she had proved her independence in the matter, so it was with some sense of self-complacency that she laid down her half-dollar and passed through the Centennial turnstile.

Her first move was to leave her umbrella and lunch basket at the cloak-window, that the weight be entirely emancipated, until at noon, or when hunger and heat demanded, she would put these articles to their appropriate use. The lunch was securely fastened with a padlock, and the provision which it contained was all signed to remind Miss Bigin independent of restaurants and waiters.

At twelve o'clock, after doing Italy, Norway and Sweden, and having worked her way into Great Britain, Bessie began to experience some feelings of fatigue; at half-past, however, at one, an aggravated hunger overtook her, and, in the latter hour, she made her way from France, which she had by this time reached, back to Italy, which, in the latter hour, she entered and approached the cloak window, before which there was still the same crowd of applicants.

"I'll take my things, if you please," said Bessie, calmly, to the attendant; "it's a dinner basket and a——"

"Don't, please," interrupted the official, while a smile of recognition lighted up her face and blushed the cheek over the girl's slender.

Bessie was annoyed, but, assuming an air of dignity, she said, in an indifferent way, "Certainly," and put her hand in her pocket.

There was no check there!

Did the man give it to her when he took the things, or not? She could not tell. Perhaps she had dropped it on the floor! Her pocket, or dropped it on the floor! Had anyone picked the basket, or did Bessie pull out the check with her hand-kerchief?

Whichever alternative she might choose to adopt, the check was not there.

"Check, ma'am!" repeated the official, as if to jog Bessie's attention. Bessie felt again, and now assured all the contents of the pocket, shook out her dress, looked intensely annoyed and experienced a sudden loss of all her previous self-possession.

"Check!" reiterated the man, in a very peremptory way, while the people around glared at Bessie as being the cause of their delay.

"Oh!" said Bessie, hurriedly, while the hot blood rushed up in her face. "I guess I must have lost the check. But you can give me the things, you know; I can identify them."

The man turned to the next applicant for a check, while he looked at the other woman, "you can't get the things, there's no check, and you can't likely you'll get no luck over 500 bundles to find yours."

"But what am I going to do?" asked Bessie, now in positive alarm.

The man shrugged his shoulders, and made no reply.

"But I must have my things," asserted Bessie positively and with bulldog then.

"You can't get them now," said the official quite as positively as the other, "so bring you can do, miss, is to wait till after six o'clock. Then if you'll come here the things will be sent all come, and I'll see you, and we'll run through what's left until we find yours. That's the best I can do for you, and you'll excuse me, I'm sure," he added, not unkindly, as she saw her evident distress.

Bessie, now almost crying, lifted her eyes to keep back the tears, and feeling the suit, as she walked mechanically away, that all the time there had been a number she couldn't get her parasol.

"I'll go to the Lafayette anyhow, and get a dinner," she said, to herself.

And then, to her dismay, she all at once recollected that her purse was locked up in the basket, and that she had not a cent in her pocket.

Now here was surely Bessie's opportunity to demonstrate all that was claimed by the "Centennial Association." And yet Bessie could not help realizing that, so far as a pecuniary consideration, her situation. She had calculated taking the New York, and to do this she must leave Philadelphia by five o'clock. So if she waited until six o'clock for her basket she would necessarily miss the train; and yet she couldn't go before that time, for her return tickets were locked up with the money. And if she staid in Philadelphia, as it seemed likely she would have to do, there was the grim anticipation of negotiating with hotel clerks and encountering all sorts of uncivil and disagreeable people. Whichever way she turned, the outlook was not an encouraging one. To tell the truth, Bessie hadn't anticipated anything at the start of her journey in the way of travel, she felt a sudden sense of inadequacy to meet them. And yet for all that she was determined that it should be a success, for it was only half past one o'clock, and Bessie had staked too much upon her own powers to allow herself defeated so early in the day. Indeed, all that was known in Donkeng was that Bessie Bigelow had gone on a special errand of business, and that was all. For, as she stood irresolutely before Macchesney Hall, where the ill-fated letter was, after which, a demand was again made to submit certain issues to a jury. Pending discussion the Court adjourned.

THE SENTINEL.

CHARLEVOIX, - - MICHIGAN.

MY JEWEL.

Rich, jewel-eyed that smile at me,
In whose bright depths I read my love;
The rest light, the fairest gem
That ever decked my fair bedside.
I have to sit and watch them rise,
And feel the swift thrill through me leap
When each fair jewel lights a new old.

Dear, earnest eyes that fondly smile,
And sweetly speak to me the while,
That look so tender, full of rest,
Yet shone as beacons and as light
As when I first my young heart steered
Within our like a seagoing bird.
And know the joy had found land,
And felt the first of passion thrill
Like love-stirred chords my being filled,
Enwined and bounden in its bond.

Though years have gone and left their traces,
Though time has laid his cheek low-fled,
And sun has pressed his burning hand;
Not to my heart-ache a spot the same
As when in color it so came,
And stood lovely, me like a queen.
When looked those eyes and smile were such
As when the wild breeze so youth
Had strewn its fragrance in my path.

Her whispers are still within my ear
Make me feel that I love to hear;
She says I'm the only thing girl
That e'er my youthful breast settled
Long, long ago, when I was young,
And golden-tresses in clusters hung;
She says I'm young now, though the years
Have brought their trail of cares and fears;
And still she loves me, for I'm
Another old, fond, foolish girl, then.

She sits beside me here to night,
One hand on my knee, the other
Rests on my shoulder, and we scout
To live again our young lifedream;
Each fair thought flouts her brow,
I know she's thinking of me now,
As dear for—than when I had
The sword, cannot take that's never old

BESSIE'S INDEPENDENCE DAY.

A FOURTH OF JULY STORY.

If Miss Bessie Bigelin, on the morning of the Fourth of July, 1876, had formulated into speech the declaration of independence which she framed in her thought, it would have asserted among other things her right to become a member of the "Donkeng Centennial Woman's Traveling Association."

Not that anyone in Donkeng denied Bessie that right, for the institution through which the women of Donkeng proposed to express their patriotic fervor on that memorable anniversary. The same day, one hundred years before—so had witnessed the liberation of those from British tyranny. The same day, one hundred years hence would commemorate the emancipation of the women of America from the tyranny of male attendance in travel. To travel unattended, it is contended, is to travel unsatisfactorily; it is to travel with some sense of self-complacency that she laid down her half-dollar and passed through the Centennial turnstile.

Her first move was to leave her umbrella and lunch basket at the cloak-window, that the weight be entirely emancipated, until at noon, or when hunger and heat demanded, she would put these articles to their appropriate use. The lunch was securely fastened with a padlock, and the provision which it contained was all signed to remind Miss Bigin independent of restaurants and waiters.

And then, to her dismay, she all at once recollected that her purse was locked up in the basket, and that she had not a cent in her pocket.

Now here was surely Bessie's opportunity to demonstrate all that was claimed by the "Centennial Association." And yet Bessie could not help realizing that, so far as a pecuniary consideration, her situation. She had calculated taking the New York, and to do this she must leave Philadelphia by five o'clock. So if she waited until six o'clock for her basket she would necessarily miss the train; and yet she couldn't go before that time, for her return tickets were locked up with the money. And if she staid in Philadelphia, as it seemed likely she would have to do, there was the grim anticipation of negotiating with hotel clerks and encountering all sorts of uncivil and disagreeable people. Whichever way she turned, the outlook was not an encouraging one. To tell the truth, Bessie hadn't anticipated anything at the start of her journey in the way of travel, she felt a sudden sense of inadequacy to meet them. And yet for all that she was determined that it should be a success, for it was only half past one o'clock, and Bessie had staked too much upon her own powers to allow herself defeated so early in the day. Indeed, all that was known in Donkeng was that Bessie Bigelow had gone on a special errand of business, and that was all. For, as she stood irresolutely before Macchesney Hall, where the ill-fated letter was, after which, a demand was again made to submit certain issues to a jury. Pending discussion the Court adjourned.

WRIGHT, BENNETT & ANDA's sash factory, in Grand Rapids, was burned on the morning of the 6th. Loss, $6,000. It was struck by lightning during the storm of the preceding day, while occupied by workmen, who supposed they had extinguished the flames.

IT was generally conceded, in Detroit, on the 6th, that Jonathan B. Tuttle (Dem.) had been elected Judge of the new Twenty-third Circuit, by a small majority.

THE Detroit brewers and saloon-keepers who propose to fight the State Liquor law have voted to give $1,000 to Carpenter $100 to investigate the matter and state his opinion of the probable outcome of the suit.

OUR NEW YORK LETTER.

New York, July 16, 1877.

The New York Custom House has been a centre of attraction for a couple of months past. First it was "severely" then it was weeded out by the abolishment of a lot of sinecure positions and the giving of a strong hint to the remainder that they would be expected to earn their pay. Then came the presidential order to Federal officials wanting them to keep their fingers out of the political sugar-bowl, and causing considerable emotion among the heads of this establishment who are also much addicted to "runing with the mashees," and now the Custom House, goaded into something almost like activity by these unprecedented onslaughts upon its time-honored corruption, has bestirred itself in the person of one of its special agents and unearthed the biggest mere's nest, in the way of smuggling conspiracy, that has swindled Uncle Sam and bothered the few honest importers of New York in a good many years. Already some fifteen of the conspirators have been arrested who acknowledge the smuggling during the past two years of nearly a million dollars worth of silks and laces. Of course frauds of such magnitude could be practised only with the connivance of steamboat and dock officers, a dozen of whom, belonging to the National Line, are found to be among the guilty parties. The method so successfully pursued was to bring over the silks in barrles which the parsees and storekeepers of the boats involved would secretly land with the aid of the shore hands who were in the ring. The goods would then be auctioned off at figures so far below the prices at which honest merchants could import them that the suspicions of the latter were aroused and finally led to the present discoveries.

The latter have a pretty serious bearing upon the steamship line in connection with which they were made. By United States law if the value of goods smuggled on any vessel is over $400 the itself is liable to confiscation as well as the goods. In the present case five first-class ocean steamships, worth nearly as many dollars, came under the provisions of this law; and while it is improbable that the latter will be rigidly enforced, the company running them will doubtless have to pay a fine which will cause them in future to exercise a stricter supervision of their employes.

The New York Central Railroad which has been working so hard and, luckily for the city, so unsuccessfully to get permission to run their cars by steam along our western water front, have had better fortune in another scheme which has just got the sanction of the city government. In pursuance of this scheme they will at once proceed to run an enormous underground pipe or main from their up-town depot to the East River, and along the botom of that stream to the point on Long Island where a large proportion of the refined petroleum used in the world is made. This important work will save an immense amount of freighting and transfering of oil which will now run direct from the cars through three or four miles of pipe to the refinery.

Secretary of State Evarts is about to lose a portion of his wealth by the foreclosure of a large and valuable piece of real estate near Brookiyn worth nearly $300,000, on account of non-payment of interest on a mortgage to the county authorities. In justice to the illustrious statesman and advocate it should however, be said that his non-payment is not because he can't, but because, having got his legal back up about something, he won't.

Dramatic amusements have been pretty much "crowded off the course," to use a "Horsey" expression, by the race regattas and steamboat excursions which form the staples of summer dissipation. Some bralesque is, however, being done to good audiences, the most popular thing being still that inimitable and irresistable "Evangeline" at the shorter-lived bonanza in a season of "Mesopa" with Fanny Louise Buckingham in the title role. Like almost every actor or actress who is sought to be put down by unjust criticism and slander, this lady has been decidedly aided by the press attacks which have been made on her, and has achieved a popular access. Next week a new candidate for a position on the list of successful plays will come before the footlights of the Park for judgement. This is an adaptation from the French called "Baby." Baby hopesthat its innocence and helplessness will disarm criticism.

The Minstrels are doing a scanty and perplitog buiness, as is their custom during the dog days. A novelty has also been developed which may be described as the reverse of minstrelsy, being a play in which darkey actors assume Caucasian parts, their faces and hands being covered with a ghostly coating of white chalk to produce an illusion as to the race of the performers who are the only victims of the deception.

John E. Owens, the popular "Solon Shingle," is lying very ill at his Maryland residence. It is to be hoped that he will recover before the opening of the Fall season. We can't spare Solon and his "bar'l of apple sass" quite yet.

July 12th, for centuries marked by riots and bloodshed on the occasion of rival parades of the Orangemen and their old-time foes, passed off in unusual quiet here. The Orangemen wisely decided to omit entirely the parade which in past years, and most notably in 1872, has been attended with such disastrous results confining themselves to picnics, excursions and similar inoffensive rejoicing. From other points, and particularly from Canada, come reports of murderous outbreaks.

In order that the code of honor may not become entirely obsolete in this enlightened land we have managed this week to get two duels under way here in New York. One challenge was issued on account of a bull-dog and the other as the result of an "argument wid shticks" over clams and beer at Coney Island. So you see that the age of chivalry is not dead yet.

RADIX.

A few years ago "August Flower" was discover to be a certain cure for Dyspepsia and Liver Complaint, a few thin Dyspeptics made known to their friends how easily and quickly they had been cured by its use. A Sterling Vegetable Remedy

Which Eradicates

DISEASES OF THE THROAT AND LUNGS, DYSPEPSIA, GRAVEL, PILES, URINARY TROUBLES, NERVOUS DEBILITY, PALPITATION OF THE HEART, TORPIDITY OF THE LIVER, CONSTIPATION, SCROFULOUS AFFECTIONS, AND FEMALE COMPLAINTS.

For nearly a quarter of a century this sterling preparation has been effecting cures of the various diseases to which it is adapted, and thousands of persons, of perfect reliability, in all classes of society have borne evidence to its wondrous remedial efficacy.

As a remedy for diseases of the Throat and Lungs it has achieved a popularity rivalled by that of few proprietary remedies. Experience has shown that for those who are troubled with weakness of the Lungs it is the best possible protective against Consumption, and it may be relied on with certainty to eradicate Bronchitis, Asthma, Croup, Diptheria, and Soreness of the Chest.

Coughs of the most obstinate kind are speedily overcome by it, and since a simple cough is very prone to develop into serious Inflammation of the Lungs, the early use of Dr. WISHART'S PINE TREE TAR CORDIAL is earnestly recommended, as it invariably prevents the further progress of the disease.

Dyspepsia, Loss of Appetite, Torpidity of the Liver and of the Kidneys are promptly overcome by this superb vegetable corrective, which not only regulates but strengthens the organs of digestion, as well as those of the urinary and biliary secretions. It imparts unwonted relish for the food, and, by promoting digestion and assimilation, enriches the blood, which is the natural motor of vital energy and nutriment to the system.

Dr. L. O. C. Wishart's Pine Tree Tar Cordial thoroughly regulates the Bowels, removes Blind and Bleeding Piles, banishes from the circulation dropsical and all other impurities, and effectually counteracts a tendency to Gravel. It also entirely obviates the weaknesses incident to females.

Dr. L. O. C. Wishart's Pine Tree Tar Cordial is no mere placebo. It is a standard medicine, and has been repeatedly recognized as such by the press and members of the medical profession, who emphatically endorse the popular verdict long since rendered in its favor.

Sold by Druggists everywhere.

DOMESTIC PATTERNS

Points by Josh Billings.

The habit of saving is a good one, but the results are sometimes simply ridiculous. I have known people tarify poor, in odd and cents, that they had saved, that were worse than nothing.

A Romantic Story.

In 1861 Miss Marie Matilda Kibbell lived with her parents, well-to-do people, at Albion, N. Y. She was then about twenty, was prepossessing in appearance, rather small in stature, with a certain masculine appearance, though not coarse, which often served her a good purpose in many ways. Early in the summer season she went with a party of excursionists to Niagara Falls, and met accidentally with Chauncey N. Niles, then of Cleveland. It was a case of mutual as well as sudden infatuation, and resulted in promises of speedy nuptials. Niles was a widower, with one child, a lad, who, since grown to manhood and to family, is now a locomotive engineer on the Lake Shore road, and lives at 375 South street, this city. Chauncey Niles and Miss Kibbell, the juvenile Niles soon went to Albion, and argued to his love-sick damsel the displeasure of Miles Kibbell's relatives. They forbade further attentions to the young lady, under penalty of sending her away to a convent. But neither was dismayed nor disheartened. They met clandestinely, and arranged an elopement. And so, having given out to friends of the family that he would yield to fate and lose his love, he started home to wait, with the promise of the girl to follow by a train fourteen hours later, to meet him at Cleveland, where Niles was known, but in Toledo. Niles hastened at once to this city, where, having staid a few hours, he took an Eastern train and met the train bearing the faithful girl at Fremont. They found they were pursued, and stopped off and were married at once by a justice of the Peace. The next train through Fremont took her brother to Toledo in pursuit, but he could get no trace further than that the couple took a train for Toledo at Cleveland. Both staid at Fremont a few days, when Niles went on to Toledo, and she followed, disguised in male attire. He secured a place in an engine yard located, he thinks now, at E. 3 street, and she, in her boy's disguise, went to peddling oranges and cigars on the street, and actually sold some to her brother on one of his trips to the city in pursuit.

At the fall when on they saw and heard no more of the searching of friends, and settled down to housekeeping, throwing off disguise, though she went out but little. The "thirst of gain" was blooding strongly—how fiercely, many a lonely bond still remembers to its sorrow. Advertisements from Cleveland were sent out for engineers to run Big Consolidated trains. Niles went there, made an engagement for himself and fireman, and subwinter found him running a down-grade engine on a Nashville railroad, with his wife, in her old disguise, as fireman. This lasted several months. On their 3 trains return to Nashville, but there were reports of a train being fired into by bushwhackers, and a number of passengers killed on the train. Niles was hurt, including the brave engineer, who paid no heed to destructions on the track, and by nearly pulling through saved the Government a valuable train of cotton. This was Niles. He was badly wounded, and on being stopped at Bullsborough, where the road was blockaded, was removed to Murfreesboro in an ambulance, and thence to a Northern hospital, while his wife fireman for hospital nurse.

In 1865, the war over, the couple found themselves in Cleveland. Niles got the gold fever, and, leaving his wife in that city, left for the West, he returned at the close of the season, however, disheartened with the wet, which had made the mining season a failure. They lived with Mrs. Niles's parents with her child in bend. Mr. Jones rejoins with the gout in his toe, Brown puts in a plea for his rheumatics, and so on, until the whole society has given in detail and summed up its diseases with the fullness and exactness of a "domestic medicine" book. There would seem to be a better reason for the use of castor-oil as a "conversational aperient" than was thought of by Dickens in his witty allusion to the young Philadelphia Quaker who opened a conversation with him by a statement "that his grandfather was the inventor of cold-drawn castor-oil."

Old Sir Bagot de Caverly was wont, whenever he heard anyone complaining in his company of being "out of order," to call immediately for some round drink for him, thinking, rightly enough, that any fellow who oppressed the cheerful ling of his kind of valetudinarianism, it would seem either to be confined to a special class of people of leisure, or exclusively acknowledged by them. Its victims, at any rate, are seldom or never heard from the lips of the busy workers of the world, and its symptoms are not regarded in the serious accounts of the hospital. This valetudinarianism, moreover, is not hypochondria, which is a veritable disease of grave import. The valetudinarian, so far from being a monomaniac, though his mind lives, his may tend to make him one, is under no delusion in regard to the seriousness or existence of his malady. He knows perfectly well quite conscious that the complaints he utters are quite beyond any pain he feels and the sympathy he asks is much more than he can justly claim.

While the bodies of these valetudinarians are so far sound as to show to the test of the physician's eye or surgeon's probe no indication of disease, and their minds continue to exhibit all the intelligence they ever did, it must be confessed that there is something morbid in their state. They possess ordinarily an excessive egotism, which leads them to an inordinate longing for personal consideration. It is generally people more favored than disposed in attaining what their vanity claims, but their merit fails to secure. Greedy, perhaps, of social recognition, and having neither the powers of entertainment of the bright and clever, nor the attractions of the amiable and beautiful, by which it may be legitimately obtained, they determine to have it at all hazard. Getting no notice from the admiration of the world, they force from it its pity, and strive to compensate themselves for its scanty smiles with the abundance of its tears.

It is astonishing how conversation is absorbed by the enumerating of people's ailments, for the great part of no real existence, or, at most, of little moment. Mrs. Smith speaks with her cold in the head. Mr. Jones rejoins with the gout in his toe.

Chauncey M. Depew, of Peekskill, has been elected Judge of the new 23d Judicial Circuit.

The Grand Rapids & Indiana Railroad company have made a change to the running of trains, which gives passengers advantages that has long been needed. They have again put on a night train. As it is now, passengers can leave Petoskey either in the morning or at night.

At a meeting of the stockholders of the Detroit Post Company Wednesday, it was unanimously voted to agree to the proposed consolidation with the Tribune. According to a gentleman prominent in the councels of both, there seems to exist no further doubt that the Post and Tribune, by which the new concern is to be known, will very shortly issue the first number of the consolidated sheet.

A complete transfer of the pension agency at Grand Rapids to Detroit was made July 5 by Samuel Post, now the pension agent for our whole State. At Grand Rapids about 2,000 pensions were paid; at Detroit 8,800. By the consolidation of offices one agent's salary and one rent will be saved. The consolidation of revenue districts in the State has quietly taken place in like manner and with like economy, until now there are only three districts where six formerly existed. Such is the action of Republican administrations, in the way of practical "reform." But the Democratic govern or of New York, who was lifted from obscurity into his high place on the cry of "reform," has vetoed a bill which would largely reduce the swarm of municipal officers in New York city and relieve the tax payers from unnecessary burdens. In the same city, by the way, the custom house employees are being reduced 20 per cent by order of President Hayes. The Democracy, being the original "spoils" party, were never known when in power to cut down the offices, and very seldom the salaries, unless (as in this county) their opponents held the positions.—Lansing Republican.

Here is a fat rumor. The President is to be ousted, and the Returning Board inducements are the first steps in the conspiracy. An alliance has been formed with the anti-Hayes Republicans and the London Democrats to play the very old scratch with things in general. The editor of the New Orleans Picayune, who has been let into the secret, unfolds it as follows: "The plan proposed, as it ignore Mr. Hayes altogether, to make Senator Conkling President pro tem., and to leave the organization of the lower House entirely with the Democrats. In pursuance of this plan, the Returning Board is under indictment at the suggestion of prominent Democrats of the North." It will be a great sight to see a President ousted by the simple process of "ignoring" him.

A correspondent of the Chicago Inter-Ocean, who recently interviewed Senator T. W. Ferry, writes as follows: "He was in an easy chair, in slippers and dressing gown, in a very comfortable state both mind and body. When the Senator has been very near to death in the past five weeks, yet he is to day looking better than he has for years. On his return from Washington in March he was worn both mentally and physically, and the break down last June was only a question of time. His complexion is clear and fresh, his eyes have lost their strange, overworked look which they had for the last six months of Grant's administration, and his physicians say he will be stronger than ever. Every care that can be taken, and he will soon be fully recovered. It has been very gratifying to him in his illness to receive so many tokens of the esteem in held. Letters of sympathy and latterly of congratulation have poured in from all quarters of the Union. With the delightful climate of Grand Haven he can hardly help getting along now."

E. P. Ferry is not recovering so rapidly as his friends might desire. It is probable that he will visit Philadelphia the latter part of this week where medical aid of the highest reputation may be summoned to his case.

THE CHURCH.—The spire to the new Church has been completed and adds to the edifice a look of dignity. It can be seen from a point far out in the lake, and is a token that in behind the hills rests a village, that is blest with a commodious house of worship.

FREE FIGHT.—Two chaps named Alurado Smith and Lavally, of the head of South Arm, had a misunderstanding concerning a young woman, and thinking it a most effective way of settling the matter they arranged for a pitched battle on Wednesday morning last, and both kept their engagement. They fought twenty minutes, and came out a couple of badly pounded up fellows—especially Lavally, who looked as if he had been through the cylinder of a threshing machine.

PICTURES.—E. A. H. Cole is building a Photographic gallery at the Head of South Arm, and will have it in running order soon. Mr. Cole is an artist of experience, having followed it as a profession for several years before entering upon his present business enterprises, and people can depend upon getting good pictures or none. We bespeak for Mr. Cole a good business. Gallery near his store at the head.

STRIKE.—On Friday Frank Loveland and Geo. Miller, salesmen at Fox, Rose & Buttars', armed themselves with shot guns, revolvers and "struck." A vigilance committee from the SENTINEL office promptly disarmed them before they succeeded in bringing around a general suspension of business among the other establishments. It is thought that the aid of Militia will not be found necessary here.

THE HARBOR.—The dredge finished work in the river on Friday and resumed work outside at the mouth, in widening and preparing for the South pier. The shoalest spot now in the channel between Lake Michigan and the harbor is ten feet, and between the piers we have full eleven feet. Mr. Burke has caused twenty-five cords of stone to be placed in the north pier-end, and the outer crib of the same to be decked over with heavy plank, as an additional protection against the heavy sea. Mr. Morgan has a large force of workmen engaged in framing the timber for the south pier, and it is expected that a crib will be floated down and sunk on Thursday of this week.

UPPER RIVER!!

Call for a Meeting to Consider the Upper River Question!

During the time that the cribs are being sunk, the dredge will be idle, and can be secured at a very low figure per day—feed and feel. This gives us an opportunity that does not often occur, and it should be taken advantage of. Therefore a Public Meeting is called to be held in this village for Monday evening August 6th, to consider the question, and a general attendance of up lake people is requested.

RAILROAD STRIKES!

They Have Spread Over the Entire Country.

The firemen and brakemen of the Baltimore & Ohio R. R. inaugurated a strike a few days ago, and the mania has rapidly spread into all the railroad centers, and has almost undermined the peace of the country. The State Militia were ordered out in Baltimore and Pittsburg, but were found to be insufficient, and Government troops were ordered to the scene of the turmoil. The troops were assailed by the mob with bricks and stones and shots were fired by both sides, the slaughter increasing the excitement until the mob ruled, and then commenced a scene unrivaled in the history of the country. Railroad property including twenty five locomotives were destroyed. The excitement is spreading fast and more trouble is inevitable. It has reached Chicago, and a reign of terror has commenced there. Be it said somewhat to the credit of the railroad men, it is the tramps, ruffians and unemployed men that carry the matter to such an extreme,—seeing in the emergency a good opportunity for plunder.

MARINE.—Cleared during the week: schooners Pinta, Mary Booth, J. P. Becombres, Little Georgie, Lillie Pratt, Evening Star, Charlevoix Boats, H. Esch, seven D. R. Owen, Belle and Annie, Prince, Shuspee, Success, Agnes.

Now in port.—Hill, Radical, Blue Belle, Sutton.

The snow Agnes, reported above, took out a cargo of hardwood lumber from head of Pine Lake, for H. Powers.

The schooner Smith brought cargo of coal from Elk Rapids for steamer Sutton.

What is an editor? Well, he is the man who sends the newspapers, writes articles on most any subject, sets type, reads proof, folds, mails, runs on errands, saws wood, draws water, makes fires, works in the garden, sweeps out, talks to all who call, is blamed for a hundred things which is nobody's business but his own, helps people to get into office (who forget all about it afterward) and frequently gets cheated out of half his earnings. He puffs and does more to build up a town than any other body, and the men and dogs are benefited thereby, but they will say the editor's paper is of no account, will not advertise or take the paper, but will borrow it. Who would'nt be an editor?—Ex.

ASSINIBOINE RESERVE telegraphs to Gen. McDowell that the Indian war is practically ended. Chief Joseph is in full retreat to the mountains, and portions of his band are daily surrendering themselves to Gen. Howard. There is no apparent danger of any further revolt. Gen. Howard has conducted the campaign with much vigor and discretion, and deserves credit for its success. In order to make that success complete, however, he ought to follow Chief Joseph wherever he flies and inflict upon him a punishment that will make Indian risings in that vicinity a serious matter.

It is reported that a rich deposit of gold has been discovered in the White Mountains of New Hampshire. Several tons of ore have been taken out and tested, some of which assayed as high as $250 and $260 per ton, 50 per cent. of the mineral product being copper, 20 per cent. oxide of gold, and lead, and 10 per cent. of silver. Whether a real bonanza has or has not been discovered, the owner of the farm where the discovery was made is [illegible] to sell to a Boston syndicate at a handsome price.

DOMESTIC.

AT the Brookfield coal mine, near Wheatland, Pa., on the 11th, a locomotive, burning anthracite coal for the first time, entered the tunnel to the mine, and, after being in a short time, the man in charge of the engine became suddenly affected by the gas from the hard coal, causing them to fall to the ground in a senseless condition. The engineer managed to make his way back to the mouth of the tunnel and give the alarm, at which a large number of men rushed into the tunnel to rescue their comrades. The after-damp had passed in, and were almost immediately overcome by it, and they too fell insensible. After several had thus fallen, a gas was organized to rescue those who went in last, and squads of four or five passed in until they succeeded in getting out, when they would take him in their arms and carry him out to the open air. In this way thirty-two were brought out, all of whom were either dead before reaching the mouth of the bank or died immediately after.

A PORTLAND (Oregon) dispatch of the 12th says a telegram had been received at military headquarters, dated Cottonwood, on the 11th, from Joseph's Band had crossed the Clear Water, and were supposed to be heading for the Bitter-Root country. Should this be true the fight would probably be a running one, and the infantry would prove comparatively non-effective, as the decisive work would have to be done by the cavalry.

THE Secretary of the Navy has addressed a letter to Capt. Howgate, originator of the plan to establish a colony for Arctic exploration, declining to detail a civil officer to accompany the expedition. The Secretary does not consider himself authorized to detail civil officers for such service, and for the same reason he regrets that he cannot comply with the request for a loan of instruments belonging to the navy for use on the expedition.

AT the Cabinet meeting in Washington on the 13th, it was decided to sell upon Gov. Terry, of Washington Territory, for volunteers to assist in the suppression of the Indian troubles in the Northwest. Nine companies of the Second Infantry had left Alamo, Ga., for St. Louis, where arrangements had been made to forward them without delay to Cheyenne, on Denver City, en route to Idaho.

A BROWNSVILLE (Texas) special of the 14th to the Galveston News says Gen. Cannies and Gen. Devin had had a conference, at which they had no difficulty in coming to an agreement in relation to suppressing raids. They were of opinion that they could render the passage of troops from one side to the other entirely safe by discharging their respective duties. Gen. Canales thought the publication of an order of such importance as that of the secretary of War to Gen. Ord without notice to Mexico was disrespectful to the Diaz Government, but he waived that and would co-operate with our authorities in any measures necessary to insure peace, and to secure the preservation of order on both banks of the Rio Grande.

THE Insurance Commissioners of Connecticut made an application for the appointment of a receiver for the Charter Oak Life Insurance Company on the 14th.

NEWS was received at San Francisco, on the 14th, to the effect that Chief Joseph and his band, on the 10th, surprised a party of thirty-one Chinamen who were coming down for Clearwater in canoes, and, for mere pastime and recreation, ruthlessly killed the whole party but one, who managed to escape in a canoe and escape. An official telegram from him, Howard states that, on the 13th, he came across the Indians, about 300 strong, in a deep canyon, near the mouth of the Cottonwood, near the south fork of the Clearwater, and a fight ensued, which lasted during the day, the enemy being driven from some of their positions. The troops say the Indians gave way, and at last accounts were in full flight westward. They had thirteen killed and quite a number wounded. Of the whites, Capt. Bancroft, Lieut. Williams and eleven enlisted men were killed, and twenty-four others wounded.

THE Tenney Engineering Company, on the 16th, issued the fifty-first call for the redemption of pre-twenty bonds and coupons of '65, the call being for $7,000,000 coupon and $2,000,000 registered bonds, principal and interest to be paid at the Treasury on and after the 10th of October next, and interest to cease on that day.

UP to the evening of the 16th, subscriptions to the new Government 4 per cent. loan aggregated $50,000,000, of which $23,700,000 were through the Syndicate and $5,400,000 through the Treasurer and Assistant-Treasurers of the United States.

POSTMASTER GENERAL JAMES resigned at Bloomfield, Mo., on the 13th, for the murder of Wm. Shaw, in October of last year. On his trial his mother and two sisters swore that he was in bed and asleep at the time of the homicide, but the jury convicted him. An intimate partner of the prisoner subsequently died, and the rest of the family swore that on his death-bed he confessed to the murder of Shaw, exonerating Poindexter. Upon this statement a requisition was granted, but the deathbed statement could not be substantiated to the satisfaction of the authorities, and the sentence was carried out. The remand and main maintained his innocence to the last.

Diving for Torpedoes.

A letter from Erzeroum in the Hamburg Correspondant gives some particulars of the new corps of divers which has been organized by the Turkish Government, for the purpose of removing the torpedoes laid down by the Russians in the Danube and on the shores of the Black Sea.

These divers, says the correspondent, are Bohdumanners from Lazistan, and a certain number of them are attached to each of the Turkish squadrons cruising in the Black Sea. Whenever the ships arrive near a spot where the existence of torpedoes is suspected, two of the divers row to the place in a very light boat, dashing as little water that there is scarcely any danger of its striking against a torpedo. On arriving at their destination one of the rowers dives into the sea: if he finds the wire or rope by which the torpedo is attached, he cuts it with a sharp instrument and returns quickly into the boat. The liberated torpedo floats to the surface of the water, the men have plenty of time to row round it, take it in tow and then row back to the ship as quickly as possible.

For each torpedo thus captured the divers are paid $45, and also a sum of money equal to one-half of its value. Although the men have been employed since last autumn, their services not a single accident has yet occurred to any of them.—Pall Mall Gazette.

THUS is the season when newly-married couples make their appearance at the watering-place hotels, languishing on a four dollars-a-day diet for one week precisely, and then go home to the realities of corn-beef and cabbage for the balance of their natural lives.—N. Y. Commercial Advertiser.

MICHIGAN STATE NEWS.

PROF. COOK, of the Agricultural College, has examined specimens of the grasshoppers which have recently made their appearance in many sections of the State. He says they are not the Rocky Mountain grasshoppers, for the Michigan article would be just as destructive as the Western if allowed to increase, which is more than the latter ever did.

AT the close of his Superintendency of the East Saginaw schools, Prof. Tarbell, State Superintendent, was presented with a handsome gold watch and chain—the gift of the teachers and the Board of Education.

TWO Scandinavian sailors, named Olsen and Erickson, were instantly killed in the Lake Superior mines, at Ishpeming, on the 10th, by a fall of rock from a hanging wall.

WM. LANE, a farmer living near Dundee, died on the 10th, of paralysis. He was seventy years old. His funeral was one of the most carefully-ordered in the West, being especially strong in emphasis on details. His diabolical skill was universal. To the last he continued heathens in his little afternoon avocation.

JOHN CLARK, Jr., for two terms Clerk of Wayne County, died at Detroit on the 10th.

G. M. WILSON, Prosecuting Attorney of Ida County, committed suicide, on the morning of the 10th, at Ida, by cutting his throat with a razor. The Coroner's jury rendered a verdict of death by the act while temporarily insane, and the deceased was buried on the 12th.

AN old farmer, named Stoker, living in the Huron-Clear Settlement, three miles from Bad Ax, committed suicide on the 13th, by hanging himself in his barn. Just as soon as I got my strength back and my clothes on, I thought for heaven have that scoundrel arrested. He might settle, though, mightn't he, if I was to hint him up and let him know that I meant to pull him through?"

Two minutes afterward the sound man was rubbing himself down Fulton street, with a startled expression, and complaining to some citizens that it was an outrage that a man couldn't be knocked insensible beaten at North Beach and then kicked out of the City Hall, when all he made a complaint about it. He would have justice though the heavens fell. He was a taxpayer and a man of family, he was, and to have his pocket-book and not suffer for it—San Francisco Mail.

A Unfortunate Rescue.

A small man with a funeral face, on one side of which was a large swelling, called at the police office yesterday, and in reply to the

"What can you do to a man that hits you and raises a lump like that?"

"Have him up for battery if he struck with his fist. If he pounded you with a club you might make assault to murder out of it," replied the official in charge.

"Pretty bad case, ain't it?" said the small man.

"Pretty good well," assented the official. "How did you get it?"

"Well," said the small man, "I went in to take a swim at Coney Beach a while ago, and the water was cool and a little rough, and somehow I felt I was going to get homesick. A big fellow on shore yelled to me to keep afloat, and then threw off his clothes and swam out to me. They were just fun, mister, I had a close squeak. When the big fellow got hold of me I was seeing stars and drinking salt water, and I just grabbed the man around the neck to save myself, and we went down together. I was out of wind and I had a bad go, for I'm a little short-hove. Now, would you believe, it, mister, the salmon my head came above water and I saw that the entire side of the fish on the cheek-bone—no, a big fish, as you might say. I never heerd of such an outrage since I seed cruelty. Did you?"

"Well," inquired the official, "what happened next?"

"Oh," said the small man, tenderly patting his swollen jaw with his handkerchief, "I dunno. The fellow knocked me out of my senses. When I come to I was layin' on the sand, and, as my head feels sore, I suppose I was pulled in by the hair. The fellow was shaking the big brute by the hand and holding out blades to him. Just as soon as I got my strength back and my clothes on, I thought for heaven have that scoundrel arrested. He might settle, though, mightn't he, if I was to hint him up and let him know that I meant to pull him through?"

CHINESE JUSTICE.

A Visit to a Prison of Canton on the Day of an Execution.

I was just resting my breakfast when I, entered suddenly and said: "They will pass in prison to-day at Nan-hoi; probably you there will be glad to accompany. Would you like to come?"

Not that executions in Canton are rare, for here they occur almost every day, but I had not yet witnessed five hundred. (?) criminals a year, to say nothing of those who perish from the effects of torture or imprisonment. But, as I rode these twelve miles between Canton and Nan-hoi, so suddenly and irregularly do they take place. A European may have been here a dozen years and yet not have an opportunity, unless he has unusual influence and puts himself in eminent pains, of seeing one. I, as has lived here some time, and is beside thoroughly knowing the city, is a sufficiently experienced linguist, and he brought he was offering me an unusual treat when extending me this invitation.

At first, as you can imagine, I hardly thanked him for the offer, but the prospect of seeing nearly and in company with an experienced physician the workings of that Chinese judicial system of which I had read accounts that I deemed fantastic, induced me to accept. "Let us go," said we, in prison, my boy," I said.

Nan hoi, the larger of the prisons of Canton, is situated in the center of the Chinese city, at a considerable distance from the European quarter. Nothing more gloomy than the surroundings of this jail can be imagined. Bound it swarm ragged, haggard, sallow men, with from rags round their necks, to pallocks in which are fastened chains reverted to iron bars or blocks of stone, which they drag painfully over the soil, as they pass through the throng begging of the visitors or offering small trinkets of their own manufacture for sale.

The prison is a long of rude buildings grouped around a large yard or ward, at the back of which is the door reserved for the passage of the living. Here, also, and not apart for the administration of justice, such justice! In the cages of the prison hundreds of prisoners, the majority charged with no crime, but simply awaiting the decision of their fate, given over to hunger, famine and vermin. There is no imprisonment here as a punishment, and often those who are condemned to suffer death or stripes are left to depend on the public or charity for food. Only "Lei" those who pity scoundrels feel them," says a maxim.)

The aspect of these dens is at once pitiful and repugnant. Spectral faces filthy behind the bars and fleshless fingers implore alms, you can see dimly human forms writhing upon heaps of filth; from the shadows come the clinking of chains and an odor so nauseous that I turned sick. It is an important personage and leaves the prison only with his assistants. Decapitating is his specialty."

At this moment the cortege entered the little gate; the coolies, out of breath and sweating, deposited their load on the ground; the executioners seized their victims, led them to the middle of the space where was barely room enough for them kneel one before the other in two lines, twenty-four persons in all stretched out their necks by raising their pinioned arms; wrapped around their skulls the queues that had been loosened or disarranged—then waited.

The Mandarin did not arrive. He had probably had some difficulty in making his way through the crowded streets, and till he reached the ground nothing could be done. While waiting for him the executioner examined critically the edge of his weapon and tightened his girdle, and the kneeling prisoners wearily twisted their untattractive necks. Thus at least ten minutes passed. Imagine what thoughts must have coursed through the brains of those poor wretches during these ten centuries of waiting, the mental torture unparalleled without motive and by sheer negligence to their physical punishment. There they were kneeling in a long line, each one beholding before him the bomb that should be dipped of its victim came I scanned the yellow faces with some such thought as this; but I did not see upon them one impression, one indication of sentiment, one muscle move, one sign of fear. Everywhere was resignation, indifference or utter unconsciousness. Two were chewing the betel-nut, or something of the sort.

At last the cortege appeared and the Mandarin's sedan appeared. This was the signal to begin. What then transpired I dare not write you. Its remembrance is like that of a nightmare. I have still before my eyes the two executioners swinging their reclosed blades round, rolling upon two ground or remaining attached to the necks by a rag of flesh, decapitated trunks slinking down all flecked with gore. Poor Ah Fong breaking off from the line to change his sweat, the edges of which had become dulled, then I saw again the sweet clicking on the neck-bone, the head of Ah Fong falling on the lucky clay, the cry of admiration I heard the thrilling stroke which followed.

In a few minutes all was done; in the middle of the yard in a pool of bloody mire lay twenty-four lopped corpses, and the executioners were plashing about in it, carrying by the hair several heads with inlived eyeballs, or dragging behind them the bodies, lurched, ignominious. At this instant the headsman, who had just noticed us, approached and presenting us with smoking with the two swords with which the work had been done, offered to sell them to us for $5, as we might like to have them by way of souvenir.—Cor. N. Y. World.

Tornadoes.

MAY, quite assured of his power and of his role soundly to manipulate ions at different times challenged to meet the most potent forces of nature, and very frequently encountered conqueror in the conflict. Now a correspondent speaks in a plain for opposing one of the most powerful and dreaded of nature's destructive forces—tornadoes. He says:

"The plan is to shoot a handful of shot, or more or less according to the quantity, through it, to break holes in the walls, which will break up the moving mass almost instantly. The tornado that struck Louis XIV. After this avalanche of pestilence the Mandarin, who had apparently only called in to take his leave of his colleagues, went out again by the way he came, and very likely, taking on their passionless faces, returned to their work.

"He is going to preside at the execution," said I, "make haste." We found the court-yard thronged with yellow uniformed soldiers armed with halberds, executioners, civilians in multi-colored jackets, parasols, palanquins, coolies, each sedan-chair carried by six coolies, and the cortege of a great Mandarin, and in the middle, seated on the ground in tenders, with evidently nothing heavily inured, a dozen ragged men, the victims.

At each moment a new captive was carried in, and the executioners were jogged them out of the cell; each was seized and bound by the murkeys and dragged to the ground, and, after suspending from a bamboo, by two bearers, a wooden tablet was placed on his neck giving his name, quality and crime, pasted upon it, a stick announced the crime for which he was to die by order of the Emperor.

The prisoners assume in the scene of execution, and we hurried into the court and set out. As we did so the hostle and sharp fife of the gongs announced that the procession was forming. So great an impression had the whole affair left on my mind that I remember but little of the procession. Who else was there at the same time? Was we not to see your friend Howard? Was he not present? Where was he? Was he not present? Where was he? Was he not present? Where was he

How to Read Aloud.

I was led to turn my attention to this subject by the affliction which my ears, mind and heart suffer and endure when listening to readers aloud, both in public and in private. Only now and then does my experience the pleasure of hearing a "good reader," and yet, what a wide-spread enjoyment can be afforded by one such!

I said "myself" to "me," "very probably you annoy other people's ears and senses in like manner as they vex yours, or it may be, jerk actually against them, you probably fail in communicating to your hearers the full interest and enjoyment which every reader ought to be able to excite in the minds of the listeners." I am once resolved to study the matter, and I need not to spend my wave.

My first object was to notice the particular faculties one had to deny. Why did the mind of such a person irritate me? Why did that of another wearey me? Why be that of a third leave only continued ships adrift?

On the other hand, what constituted the special charm of the good reader? Why was the pleasure to listen to him or her, so that one immediately felt disappointed when the book was closed? Now that I can, be the reason what it might, I felt able to understand and to appreciate it.

And here let me say at the outset that the possession of a sweet, musical voice, low not indeed at all essential for a good reader. I have listened to people reading aloud in the most silvery tones, to whom I have longed to say, "Stop, I beseech you!"

Let me now tell you the result of my observations.

I perceived that a distinct utterance and a perfect pronunciation were very essential, but neither the absorption of the proper articulation of words; "In just attention the words are not hurried over, nor mashed together; they are neither slurred nor prolonged; they are not swallowed, nor are they shot forth from the mouth as a mother or nurse would send them softened to drop unbushed; but they are delivered from the lips as beautiful coins are issued from the Mint, deeply and accurately impressed, neatly struck by the proper organs, distinct, sharp, perfectly finished."

Here, then, is the key which opens and lets loose to the delectation and taste of the reader who practises and wears the last new forms of embellishment and sloven. At the same time we are shown the particular habits and attainments of the reader who pleases the ears of his auditors.

How little need is told in general to small words! And yet they are worth talk our ears of, for the effect is always endangered by those so punctiliously observed them. Take, for instance, "and" and "an," pronounced as in the last letter, "an" and "an," pronounced as in the word "ann," are in not allowed changed into "and" and "an," as is often changed when reading to a short time, they would soon become inefficient and powerless. Then, again, the word "the," which comes in over and over again in every page, but you will observe that nearly every pronounced as a toughed do not adopt the true "the"—probably the majority of them are mistaken of the ones. Then you hear this pass by, and whether you be aware of the omission or not, you feel that something is wanting. Again, "a" is pronounced "ay" instead of "uh," "ah," or "ah," as the case may be, and "to" is sometimes "tu" instead of "tuh," "tah," or "toh," as the case may be. Then, "of" is not seldom changed into "ov," and "ov" into "uv," and sometimes a spelling of "ov" into "uv" is heard, which is more than the sweetness of the "ov" and "uv" have said your own knowledge and your own ears will point them out. If you seek to be instructed, I trust you will not only read, but you are nevertheless worthy of attention, and worthy of attending.

Very rarely the reader will feel at first somewhat peculiar in style, when paying particular attention to all words, great and small. I now find, for a new habit never sits with ease between the feelings disappeared, for practice wore off and smoothed down the extra efforts which were observable at the outset.

But it is possible to articulate perfectly and yet read in a drowsy, tiresome, tedious manner, and this is attained mainly by correct articulation, but not solely. Due tone must be given to punctuation. Most people know that the use of punctuation demand a proper and different utterance at a pause, and a corresponding one in any sentence, as a summons, there at a colon, and four at a full stop. A rightful servance of a few such as this would, of course, break into and spoil the interest of a good poem, but it would tend to remember that some attention should be paid to these marks. Readers require to take breath for their exertions, and this should always be taken at a stop. Often I hear people talking in while in the middle of a sentence; nay, I have heard them doing so in the middle of a word. This, of course, involves another stop, which is an awkward interjection.

If you desire to read quickly and at the same time to be intelligible and distinct, you must read in a sonorous, silky fashion—utter your words glibly, slightly shortcuts. If you utter, you will hear many of those who are called upon to read aloud in public buildings adopt this style, and it is partly owing to this peculiarity that every word is heard without the audience straining their ears to catch them.

I have now set forth the necessary requirements for being heard, and understood, but that should not be the only aim in the minds of him or her who reads aloud. Listen to some more the words which have reference to this subject: "There is no composition in music, however perfect as to key or melody, but in order to do justice to its author will require something more than an exact adherence to time and tune. It is this which gives music its power over the passions, and it is called expression." Let two people play the simple tune of "Home, sweet Home," each will play it quite correctly; but one will so express himself by very different if one plays it with merely mechanical accuracy, and the other adds expression and feeling to correctness of execution.

This, then, is what constitutes the qualification of a good reader in the proper sense of the term—expression. To hear books, whether grave or gay, heavy or light, whether political, theological, biographical or geographical, whether novelists or arguments, to hear everyone of these various subjects read in the same tone of voice is extremely trying to the ears of the listeners. Proper and suitable variations of the voice and manner we must have, if enjoyment is to go hand in hand with instruction. We want nothing theatrical, no affectation, but an avoidance of mechanical, sing-song, laudrum, droning reading, such as that with which we are forcedly punished.

A pathetic subject surely needs pathos in the tone; a gay and lively subject must be possessed with a light and airy manner. Conversations require variety of tones. In fact, nature has given to half a dozen people to ask and answer questions and make remarks in exactly the same pitch of voice? Yet this is the most usual way they are represented as uttering them by the reader aloud. Descriptions of scenery require more even tone of tone, so do lucks of a grave and learned character.

I have now given you the directions which I gathered and followed myself, and with good results, for, at the risk of being considered atrociously conceited, I must tell you that I am now a proficient in the art of reading aloud. I am not a professional reader, nor do I pretend to read the parts and dramatists, but my home circles wherever I sojourn I find I can give pleasure, and am always called upon to use my powers of reading aloud. Fortunately for me I have also attained the power of reading for a great length of time without feeling weary—four hours at a stretch does not fatigue me now. When one thinks of the many to whom one can afford this enjoyment—the sick, the aged, the blind, and the busy—a feeling of self-satisfaction and thankfulness steals over the mind that one may do something to alleviate their sufferings and lighten their burdens.—Harper's Bazar.

Longfellow Embarrassed at a London Banquet.

When Longfellow visited London, a dinner was given to him at the Langham Hotel. It was a surprising fact that this dinner should be unlike the usual semi-public banquet, inasmuch as there should be no addresses and no proposing of toasts. There were many distinguished guests present. They were each in turn presented to Longfellow. Then came the dinner. It was excellent. A bright and general conversation had sprung up unhindered by this nonsense. Just as the dessert was being served, Mr. Longfellow was approached by a gentleman, who asked for a speech, and without a word, Mr. Longfellow was upon his pleasure. He opened his mouth. No sound came forth. A second time he essayed to speak, with a like result. At last he said: "Gentlemen, I thank you, and I was understood that there were to be no speeches."—Cor. N. Y. Times.

"A Living Tomb."

All the bowels of the bureaux try to distourage young men from entering the department, as it is life without a future. On the other day I heard a Cabinet Minister talking to a young chap wanting a place.

"My young friend," said he, "you apply. You may not be able to pass an examination, this would be mortifying. Save your money and your patience, and go home. Saw wood, drive cows, anything honest, but preserve your independence. A confidential clerk is an agreeable situation for anything. Not one in ten save a dollar. This is an expensive place to live. Board is high and the weather hot. I have a man in my department who has been in forty years."

"Forty years!"

"Yes, every day of it. He came in in 1836. Well, he's there still, the same as any he did to commence with. The other day he came to me saying: 'I ought to have died forty years ago.' 'You don't mean that,' said I. 'Yes,' said he, 'I mean that. I have been buried in this building forty years, and I might as well have been buried in my grave. What's the difference between tombs? Of what advantage to myself have I been here? I had nothing when I came in and have nothing now. I am disqualified for anything. If I was turned out to-day I would starve to-morrow.' So much for a Government position that young men are so anxious to get. They loiter let it alone."

The Cabinet Ministers have an assortment of experiences like the slaves, which they relate for the encouragement of young men who press for place. But in the face of all this and the civil-service rules, and the harrowing experience of those turned out and finding themselves fitted for nothing—in the face of all these discouraging circumstances, the applicants crowd in an everlasting stream.—H. V. Bedford's Washington Correspondence.

Chicken-Raising by Machinery—The Largest Poultry Farm in the World.

A New York World reporter has been visiting the mammoth machine chicken hatching and feeding establishment of Mr. Baker, some sixteen miles south of Jersey City, in the edge of the Palisades. Mr. Baker keeps over 2,000 fowls, but these do not furnish a tenth of the eggs used, which he intends shall reach the grand total the coming year of 250,000. The incubating apartment of his poultry-house is about twenty feet square, protected by double sets of windows, and containing eight large incubators or hatching cases. Each of these contains eight tiers of shallow egg-drawers, one above another, and they will all hold, when filled, nearly 8,000 eggs. Over each of these tiers of drawers parallel rows of hen-sitter pipes are placed, which send out a steady heat from above upon the eggs in the trays beneath. The gas for heating the water is manufactured by a large machine in the basement. Burning gas lets beneath each incubator heats the water in the pipes, and, by an automatic arrangement, when ever the heat rises above a fixed point the supply of gas is cut off. But the gas burn less brightly, and the water in the pipes is allowed to cool to the desired point. When that point is reached the supply of gas is restored, and the heating process goes on as before. An electric battery communicates with the incubators, and any undue variation of heat is announced to the attendants through indicators. When the eggs are ready to hatch they are put in the animal heat evolved from them by the incubators that the temperature of the air in the drawers is affected materially. As even slight variations of temperature are unfavorable for the hatching of eggs, it is sometimes necessary, in spite of the automatic arrangement for regulating the heat, to take out the drawers and allow the eggs to cool, and this is done by an ingenious device for striking of an electric bell connected with each case. The cases are numbered, and the number at the indicated case is shown by an indicator on the wall of an adjoining room. When the reporter was in the room the bells were ringing quite vigorously, and the woman in charge was consequently obliged to pay close application in order to find the right cases. White, brown and mottled eggs lay side by side in the drawers, and the attendant showed how, under the microscope, from 100 degrees to 110 degrees, the chicks are gradually formed. The brooding-house is 30 by 158 feet, and contains 50 separate compartments, each accommodating 100 chicks. The hen mother is a hollow zinc box with sleeping-room which is filled with hot water, and placed a few inches above the ground floor. The under side of the box is lined with blankets, and the chicks creep under it at night when they feel tired of outer warmth. The brooding-house is heated by steam, but the temperature varies somewhat, and the under chicks are very susceptible to cold.

In another building 500 feet long and divided into seventy-five compartments for laying hens are confined. The interior is fitted up with everything which a well-regulated hen could possibly require to make her comfortable and clean. By means of an ingenious arrangement of pulleys and weights, 25 feet of perches can be lowered into the middle of this large room, and, thundering on the table, begs can be struck. He would not be 653 down. Yes, he knew what the agreement was, but he also knew that at the board sat the most eloquent of English men, and he called upon Mr. Gladstone to say a few words in honor of the great American poet. Mr. Bait and monsieur his rabbles work well. He sat down amid a loud cheer, and presently Mr. Gladstone rose to still louder plaudits. The orator himself was taken aback, but he was equal to the occasion, and he paid a glorious tribute of eloquent praise to the poet. When Gladstone sat down Longfellow stood up. Thunderous cheers greeted the grand old man, but the grand old man was very miserable. If they had given him a pen and called on him for a poem he would have done well enough, but expect to a speech, and without a word, Mr. Longfellow was upon pleasure. He opened his mouth. No sound came forth. A second time he essayed to speak, with a like result. At last he said: "Gentlemen, I thank you, and I was understood that there were to be no speeches."—Cor. N. Y. Times.

Curious Facts About the Tidal Wave.

The more detailed statement of the late earthquake in Peru received from New York gives the date of the occurrence as the 9th, but the compiler provisingly omitted the hour of the day. The first report of the convulsion, received by the Postdolent was of London, gave the date as the 10th. But a calculation of the time at which the tidal wave which followed the earthquake manifested itself in other points shows that this could not have been correct. The chances are that the telegraphic agent at London failed to notice that there were about nour hours' time against him between Peru and his station. What was to him the 10th of May was the latter part of the 9th at the scene of the disturbance. Unfortunately, it no one in the exact period of time given at which the tidal wave appeared anywhere, so that no precise calculation can be made. But approximations are possible, which indicate that we may be on the eve of important scientific discoveries.

Taking our date of 7:10 a. m. as a basis we reach the following facts: The Sandwich Islands being 2,000 miles further westward are 2 20 minutes ahead of it in time. At four a. m. the tidal wave manifested itself at Hilo. That world-renowned 6:30 a. m. at Anaheim. The time at the transmission of the wave to this coast would seem therefore to have been fifty minutes. Now, the time reported at Acapulco is ten a. m. But Acapulco is about 1,500 miles more easterly than the coast of California. The difference in time will therefore be one hour and forty minutes. Added to say, Acapulco is that much, behind us. Four a. m. at Hilo would represent eight a. m at Acapulco, the latter only allowing for the time of the transmission of the tidal wave between these points.

The fact is here to be noted is that the tidal wave rolled upon the beach at Hilo fifty minutes before it was felt on the coast of California, and no longer before it inundated Acapulco. The height to which it attained at these points would seem to strengthen this view, for it was in greatest force at the place where it rose the highest. Waves lose force as they progress. Thus the tidal wave was twelve feet three inches at Hilo, five feet at Anaheim and three feet at Acapulco. But at the point of the original disturbance it was sixty-five feet high. This estimate is not extravagant when it is considered what it did, viz.: it destroyed many towns, and lifted the United States steamer Wateree, situated by the tidal wave of 1868, and carried her entire over two miles from her old position.

The force of the impact of the tidal wave on the coast of Peru, the calculation would be completed. But so far, its dimensions are considerable. Sixty-five feet high at Merriphones, twelve feet three inches at the Sandwich Islands; five feet on the coast of Peru—these are not an unmanner demands that he release the girl, to which the man returns by giving the organ grinder a blow that knocks him to the ground. Officer Schneider, who was in the vicinity at the time, was called up, and took the two men in charge. The girl was also taken in charge, and thundering on the table, he gave the speak. He would not be 653 down. Yes he knew what the agreement was, but he also knew that at the board sat the most eloquent of English men, and he called upon Mr. Gladstone to say a few words in honor of the great American poet. Mr. Bait and monsieur his rabbles work well. He sat down amid a loud cheer, and presently Mr. Gladstone rose to still louder plaudits. A Cossack Sentinel.

A approach to Glurgeon is now forbidden by Cossack sentries, good-tempered but unexcusable, perfectly stupid, but firm as rocks. No one is suffered to approach with out a pass from the Russian authorities. Every thought, even, is guarded, and the Commandant de Plaine himself has taken up his quarters in the railway station.

It is curious that Cossacks are to me a source of bitter annoyance, and not good-humored insolence, their self-possession, their constant disregard of the mere foreigner, are traits so startling to observe. It would have been impossible for any other troops to have thrown further feet high." Sometimes the original soil being disturbed, a new vegetation will spring up along the wagon-track, and thus mark out the road for miles.

Even on hard rock a man's bare feet will leave the dust caked together by perspiration, so that a practiced eye will see it, and even from ten feet or more the footprints will be distinguished from each other, the pole of a pebble which had long path next the ground being shaped. There are also impressions made at least that buried it less passed very recently. If a shower of rain has fallen during the night, and no vehicle was made before, during, or after the shower, absolute certainty can be obtained from the depth and distinctness of the impressions. Hans Pfiech was an artist, for notoriously outlaw he remained in Glurgeon at single blow, but the knew and respected that subject's rights and preferences. The old rock dwelt the Sabbath morning with black doublet and red hose; he wore long black silk stockings, short, close fitting pantaloons of black velvet, a black cap and black gloves. He would not touch the handle of his ax with his bare palm; instead the gold in Prussia coin, and no longer indeed how to commit such a flagrant breach of seafood etiquette.

Nevertheless, the Germans insisted on overlooking the fact that he wore gloves and saw the blood upon his hands. Friesh had no friends and no foes except his parishioners. People all knew him and shrank from him. To enable him to leave the town he worked only till noon, although although one of his long, black silk stockings was generally found. The housekeeper, in the long run, found that with straining food and constant care his tools by gear. It is well in winter to have a supply of food for the fowls is distributed to the different compartments by means of small trucks which run on a railway, and the way which extends the whole length of the building. Fresh water is carried through pipes and delivered in troughs, a range of pens, and the water troughs and feeding-hoppers are models of convenience. About 2,000 laying hens of the different varieties are kept in these pens —leghorns, Spanish, Dorkings, Houdans and others—and all appeared strong and healthy.

From this building the attendant led the way to the incubating house, a building near by. This is a wooden building 125 feet long by twenty-five feet wide. Unlike the other buildings it is lighted by small rather than large windows, for in the process of fattening the fowls darkness and coolness have been found essential. The mode of fattening is similar to that in use in France, but is an improvement upon the latter in many important its details. Within the house eight upright cylinders occupy the greater part of the building, and by all. Her beauty and lady-like manners were not lost on the rugged, gruff old Russian, that was manifested upon, and in penny after penny dropped into her lambourine, it was no doubt given more out of sympathy for her than as an assurance of appreciation of strains whose ground out at the old music box.

So much by way of introduction and now for the sequel of our story.

Last Wednesday forenoon, shortly after ten o'clock, the old Italian was grinding out the "Last Rose of Summer," on South Canal street, when a man wearing a foreign air took a place among the little in the room the bells were ringing vigorously, and the woman in charge was consequently obliged to pay close application in order to find the right cases. Romance of a Street Musician.

Last Monday, Tuesday and Wednesday he continued his attention attracted by the piercing notes of a hand-organ, presided over by a representative of sunny Italy. The organ-grinding lion was a bright, attractive little girl of eight years, whose shining black eyes and long black curls were setting by all. Her beauty and lady-like manners were not lost on the rugged, gruff old Russian, that was manifested upon, and in penny after penny dropped into her lambourine, it was no doubt given more out of sympathy for her than as an assurance of appreciation of strains whose ground out at the old music box.

So much by way of introduction and now for the sequel of our story.

Last Wednesday forenoon, shortly after ten o'clock, the old Italian was grinding out the "Last Rose of Summer," on South Canal street, when a man wearing a foreign air took a place among the little group assembled. By way of change from grave to gay a lively Irish jig was struck up, and the little girl began dancing with an Irish navvy on her tambourine. This appeared to offend the man with the foreign air very much, and he gave vent to his indignation by a frown. The music stops the little girl collects her pennies and the pair move off a little way, and the "Mulligan Guards" comes marching from the organ, and the little street Arab keeps time with her tambourine. Again the man with the foreign air appears on the ground, shows signs of humanity, and when the performance is concluded he calls the child to him, and, placing a few coins in her hand, he took her on shoulder and walked off. The child's companions came along and stole her. After the man had walked a few blocks with the child he called a passing hack, and, placing her inside, he told the driver to proceed. The Cossack, all his teeth on view, said one syllable, which meant "no," and stood there, grinning in the kindest manner, but fixed as the gout Terminus. A crowd of unfortunate Russians subject round him, and he preached with a pass in the native tongue. He honored these also with a passing smile sometimes, but that is best attention were all for no. I talked, argued, entreated and reviled him, without lessening for an instant the beam of complacent amiability. Not a word did he reply, and I grew silent, bussed at length by the fascination. Then was suddenly conveyed to me the interpretation of the mystic passage in "Wonderful," where the Cheshire cat leaves a grin behind even after he has vanished.

The Cossack's bright smile haunts me still." He had, however, a companion of more serious cast, who finally was persuaded to inform us that an official might be found somes miles away, across the corn-belt. Thither we drove, pursued to the very town by our Cossack's beaming countenance. And at the camp we found Col. Oriolf, who received us with that perfect courtesy and soldier-like frankness where-in Russian officers are distinguished above all whom I have met. He was the regiment sheltered yesterday, and he gave me the freedom. Under guidance of the orderly we reached the town across the cornfields, and, to our great disappointment, were debarred from triumphing over that Cossack jailer.—Glurgeon Cor. London Standard.

Death of a Headsman.

An old man died at the age of eighty, a few days ago, in the dreary street of Chatenet-Landon, Paris, who for some years lost dwelt there absolutely alone and unknown. He was stout, solidly-built, not talkative, but good-humored and friendly. He was known to be a Bertiner by birth, but he did not care to talk about himself, and his early history was shrouded with mystery. Hans Friesh was the name by which he passed among his neighbors. He only went out of evenings, and then but for a short time, exchanging a few strokes of the hand with acquaintances. Why is he heard a German voice he turned away or crossed the street to avoid the owner. He never read the papers, and received letters but rarely, yet he looked himself most of the time writing—what, he refused to say. He had no visitors, paid his rent punctually, was and retired early, and lived well. In fine, he was the perfect type of a small bourgeois retired from business and living on his income. To women he was always polite, to children more than kind. He did until his death dirt in fact become public that Hans Friesh had been the headsman of Berlin.

Headsman is the true significance of the word, not a mere mechanical pulling of cords and loading of weights, like Samson, Roch, for during the period he executed the haute œuvre at the Prussian Capital, ending in 1840, the system of decapitation was employed for the decapitation of criminals. Hans Friesh was an artist, for notoriously outlaw he remained in Glurgeon at single blow, but the knew and respected that subject's rights and preferences. The old rock dwelt the Sabbath morning with black doublet and red hose; he wore long black silk stockings, short, close fitting pantaloons of black velvet, a black cap and black gloves. He would not touch the handle of his ax with his bare palm; instead he had a pair of gloves made of the finest kid, and these he wore on the occasions of his official duties. He would not touch a piece of money with his bare hand, but carefully covered it with a piece of black velvet, a habit he retained to the day of his death. He would not touch the handle of his ax with his bare palm; instead the gold in Prussia coin, and no longer indeed how to commit such a flagrant breach of seafood etiquette.

Nevertheless, the Germans insisted on overlooking the fact that he wore gloves and saw the blood upon his hands. Friesh had no friends and no foes except his parishioners. People all knew him and shrank from him. To enable him to leave the town he worked only till noon, although although one of his long, black silk stockings was generally found. The housekeeper, in the long run, found that with straining food and constant care his tools by gear. It is well in winter to have a supply of food for the fowls is distributed to the different compartments by means of small trucks which run on a railway, and the way which extends the whole length of the building. Fresh water is carried through pipes and delivered in troughs, a range of pens, and the water troughs and feeding-hoppers are models of convenience. About 2,000 laying hens of the different varieties are kept in these pens —leghorns, Spanish, Dorkings, Houdans and others—and all appeared strong and healthy.

From this building the attendant led the way to the incubating house, a building near by. This is a wooden building 125 feet long by twenty-five feet wide. Unlike the other buildings it is lighted by small rather than large windows, for in the process of fattening the fowls darkness and coolness have been found essential. The mode of fattening is similar to that in use in France, but is an improvement upon the latter in many important its details. Within the house eight upright cylinders occupy the greater part of the building, and by all. Her beauty and lady-like manners were not lost on the rugged, gruff old Russian, that was manifested upon, and in penny after penny dropped into her lambourine, it was no doubt given more out of sympathy for her than as an assurance of appreciation of strains whose ground out at the old music box.

So much by way of introduction and now for the sequel of our story.

Last Wednesday forenoon, shortly after ten o'clock, the old Italian was grinding out the "Last Rose of Summer," on South Canal street, when a man wearing a foreign air took a place among the little group assembled. By way of change from grave to gay a lively Irish jig was struck up, and the little girl began dancing with an Irish navvy on her tambourine. This appeared to offend the man with the foreign air very much, and he gave vent to his indignation by a frown. The music stops the little girl collects her pennies and the pair move off a little way, and the "Mulligan Guards" comes marching from the organ, and the little street Arab keeps time with her tambourine. Again the man with the foreign air appears on the ground, shows signs of humanity, and when the performance is concluded he calls the child to him, and, placing a few coins in her hand, he took her on shoulder and walked off. The child's companions came along and stole her. After the man had walked a few blocks with the child he called a passing hack, and, placing her inside, he told the driver to proceed. The Cossack, all his teeth on view, said one syllable, which meant "no," and stood there, grinning in the kindest manner, but fixed as the gout Terminus. A crowd of unfortunate Russians subject round him, and he preached with a pass in the native tongue. He honored these also with a passing smile sometimes, but that is best attention were all for no. I talked, argued, entreated and reviled him, without lessening for an instant the beam of complacent amiability. Not a word did he reply, and I grew silent, bussed at length by the fascination. Then was suddenly conveyed to me the interpretation of the mystic passage in "Wonderful," where the Cheshire cat leaves a grin behind even after he has vanished.

The Cossack's bright smile haunts me still." He had, however, a companion of more serious cast, who finally was persuaded to inform us that an official might be found somes miles away, across the corn-belt. Thither we drove, pursued to the very town by our Cossack's beaming countenance. And at the camp we found Col. Oriolf, who received us with that perfect courtesy and soldier-like frankness where-in Russian officers are distinguished above all whom I have met. He was the regiment sheltered yesterday, and he gave me the freedom. Under guidance of the orderly we reached the town across the cornfields, and, to our great disappointment, were debarred from triumphing over that Cossack jailer.—Glurgeon Cor. London Standard.

HOME, FARM AND GARDEN.

—Col. Scott says that, as far as practicable, hay should be cured the day it is cut, and put up in cocks for the night. The next day, if the weather be favorable, open it out, turn it over, and take it to the barn or stack.

—The best way to plow mud-flants into heavy strips of galvanized tracks at the sides as well as at the ends of the field, all of equal width, and then finish the whole by going round with one cutting furrow until it is completed come to the finer, thus avoiding the treading down of newly plowed land.—Iowa State Register.

—To stall potatoes, cut a thin slice from the upper part of a smooth, ripe tomato; do not peel; take out all of the inside and chop it fine; fry a very little chopped onion in some butter, and when it is turning yellow add the chopped tomato and a few fine bread crumbs, stir well, season with salt, pepper, and a little chopped parsley—fresh this and the onion can be omitted if not liked. Simmer a minute and fill the tomato with the mixture. Place in a pan; fit each top on its own tomato and bake for an hour or until it is tender.

—A practical trial for a good many years has proved the following recipe an excellent one for protecting against moths. Take one gill alcohol, one gill spirits of turpentine, mix, and dissolve therein one ounce of camphor gum. Put into a stoppered glass vessel, and shake well before using. With this mixture wet some blotting paper and put in the upper tray into the box or drawer where the fur to be protected will be kept; the tin should be nitrogen in fine. Wardrobes containing clothing should also be provided with these paper balls, the smell of which will drive away and kill all moths, but quickly disappear on exposure to the air. This procedure should be repeated every year.—Country Gentleman.

—Plaster of Paris is highly recommended by some who have tried it for bugs that infest vines. A correspondent of the New York Tribune says: Having often seen inquiries in your columns for something to keep bugs off squashes and melons, and having tried everything I ever heard of, also found at last what seems to be, here, at least, a sure cure, I will now let both me and others know it. Nearly two years since, while talking with a friend of the ravages of the bugs, he said: "How would you like plaster of Paris?" We used it last season, and it worked well." Of course we took the hint, and that season, 1875, we saved our cucumbers and squashes with it—we had no bugs. This summer we used it on melons, summer and winter squashes and cucumbers with very satisfactory results. Last year we bought three pounds of Paris at a marble shop, where you will find it the best and cheapest. Watch your vines closely, and when the leaves have grown large enough to please the striped bug, go out early in the morning while the dew is on, taking a box for your plaster, get on this windward side of the vines, and sprinkle the powder thoroughly over them till they are well whitened. If there are striped bugs on them you will see them double up and roll off in a very disgusted manner. It is just as good for the large black bug. The vines must be watered and gone over after every shower, as the wind and rain will wash most of the plaster off. Don't fancy that gypsum, or plaster as it is called here and in many other places, will do. It will not. Plaster of Paris is the thing.

Thinning out Fruit.

It is a well known fact that the inflexible laws of supply and demand governs the prices of produce of all kinds. This fact being remembered, it is only necessary to bear in mind that the quantity of ordinary or inferior quality of produce is always in excess, and when a "glut" in the market happens, anything beyond the ordinary consumption of the community is naturally gravitate toward the best, which they can buy at fair prices—prices which pay the producers even though they can get poor or ordinary quality of the same at their own figures, which are, as a rule, below the cost of production and marketing, bringing the producer in debt, instead of remitting him even merely a fair profit on his labors.

There are very many ways to increase the size of fruit, such as only plant-ing those varieties best suited to your soil and climate, cultivating thoroughly and thinning out the fruit at certain stages of growth. Thinning out apples, especially in a large orchard, to make them grow to a larger size, is but very recently the practice in the vicinity of the apples to come to nearly per fection under the best system of pruning and cultivation, the consequently small increase is preconsidered for slightly larger specimens produced by thinning the fruit. The case, however, is different with pears; for the amount produced annually is far less than with apples, and the price per bushel or basket is considerably higher.

To enable pears to grow to a larger size and to make size and quality rank ahead of mere quantity (though we believe that nearly the same weight of fruit is obtained by judicious thinning out, but in fewer number of pears), the last should be thinned out about two or three times during a season—in all we spent one-half or more of the numbers of pears first set on the trees. About two weeks after the blossoms have dropped, go over the trees and sort out a few of the poorest specimens and carefully remove them from the tree, having a care not to disturb the remaining. In from two to four weeks later go over the orchard again, and remove a few more of the inferior ones in the same careful manner; and again in about the same length of time give the orchard a third visit for the same purpose, which generally constitutes the last thinning-out. Some growers prefer to go over the orchard once, during June, and thin out the fruit.—N. Y. Independent.

Cincinnati proposes to economize by lighting her public lamps a half hour later and extinguishing them a half hour earlier than heretofore. The estimated saving is $90,000 yearly, which is enough to make the change an object.

The Boston Journal of recent date says: "On Friday evening, as a gentleman was promenading with two ladies in the grounds at Harvard, while the throng was at its thickest, some one threw a brickbat right upon the people from a window in Holworthy hall. The last of the gentlemen was crushed over his head, and one of the ladies, the wife of Mr. Joseph Williams, of Cambridge, was so much injured that she has been ill ever since. Her comb was found late her hurt, and she was severely bruised."

VEGETINE.
SHE RESTS WELL.
South Poland, Me., Oct. 11, 1876.
Mr. H. R. Stevens:
Dear Sir: I have been troubled with the Dyspepsia for many years, and, having taken various remedies, but none of them did me any good. I was recommended to try your VEGETINE, which I did, and am happy to say that I have received great benefit from its use. I can recommend the VEGETINE for what it is represented to be. Yours truly,
Witness of the above: Mrs. ALBERT BICKFIL.
Mr. GEORGE M. VAUGHAN.
Medford, Mass.

Vegetine.
Thousands will bear testimony (and do it voluntarily) that VEGETINE is the best medical compound ever placed before the public, for renovating and purifying the blood, eradicating all scrofulous impurities or poisonous secretions from the system, invigorating and strengthening the system, debilitated by disease; in fact, it is, as many have called it, "The Great Health Restorer."

Safe and Sure.
Mr. H. R. Stevens:
In 1857 your VEGETINE was recommended to me, and, following the directions as given, I commenced to use it. At the time I was suffering from general debility and nervous prostration, accompanied by overwork and irregular habits. Its wonderful strengthening and recuperative powers soon manifested themselves upon me, from the first dose; and under its use I rapidly recovered my health, and have since been in the enjoyment of excellent health. I have continued to give VEGETINE my most unqualified indorsement as being a safe, sure and powerful agent in promoting health and restoring the wasted system to new life and energy. VEGETINE is the only medicine I use, and as long as I live I never expect to find a better. Yours truly, H. H. CLARK.

VEGETINE.
The following letter from Rev. O. W. Mansfield, formerly pastor of the Methodist Episcopal Church, Hyde Park, and at present settled in Lowell, most emphatic every one, as to the character of our wonderful curative qualities of VEGETINE as a thorough cleanser and purifier of the blood:
Hyde Park, Mass., Feb. 19, 1876.
Mr. H. R. Stevens:
Dear Sir: Some years ago my health failed, through the debilitating effects of dyspepsia, nearly a year's wasting disease. I settled in Hyde Park, and was induced to use VEGETINE. I took three bottles, large, deep seated abscess, which was fifteen months in gathering. I had two surgeons to operate, but at last, to the state, but received no permanent benefit. I was induced to use VEGETINE, and before I had taken one bottle I felt relief. I have had small pieces of bone at different times since I commenced using VEGETINE. I have taken in all about seven years, till May, 1875, when a friend recommended me to go to your office, and see what VEGETINE would do for me. I did so, and I am now free from disease

EDITOR SENTINEL.

DEAR SIR.—The feature that strikes the observation most in the rich rural southern districts of England is the great quantity of Timber growing, and a stranger can judge the quality of the land by quantity and kind of timber. The hedge rows are studded with elm in all the bottom lands and on the upper lands beech and oak. So plentiful is timber here that we find it impossible to dispose of a couple of Black walnut trees growing on a piece of land on which we are about to build a Wesleyan chapel. We have at length bargained them for an equal quantity of Elm and disposed of the Elm to a wheelright for which to make hubs and fellers, being very tough and much harder than American elm. Large flocks of sheep are kept by farmers and it is just this that keeps up their land to its astonishing productiveness. The course the farmers take here is an 8 year course 1I we commence with clover, it would be wheat next, then next oats or barley or peas, then wheat, next sweeds succeeded by oats or barley. Then the 8th year clover, which cannot be grown oftener than once in eight years. The sweeds being fed off by sheep the ground is manured for the next crop either of oats or barley, while commercial manure is used for the sweeden and they are used to fat sheep and beeves with in connection with oil cake or cotton seed cake, and it is this enriching material (cotton seed and oil cake) that helps to force such heavy crops; the wheat here looks as though it would yield sixty bushels. It is too early yet to judge of the barley or oats. Farmers have just put up a crop of hay larger than usual, and are busy sowing sweeds, and in most cases with prepared phosphate, a great quantity of mangolds are raised. These keep, and are fed to fat cattle and sheep after the sweeds are gone, and it is wonderful how large they grow —many 18 inches long by 7 or 8 through and are very fattening being very sweet. It is astonishing to me that so many oilcake and cotton seed is sent to enrich others that ought to be used at home. Another thing that strikes an observer is the care with which woods are fenced. This allows the sprouted timber to grow into small poles or rods, out of which hurdles are made. These make movable fences to pen up the sheep on the spot they wish, and save hauling. This is a very great gain to them, whereas anyone going through the older settled portions of Indiana, Michigan and Ohio will see how perfectly the ranging of cattle there is converting the whole country into a desolate wilderness as far as timber is concerned, besides the whole country as traversed by rail looks as remarked to me—like the "widows farm." Let any intelligent farmer come to England, get on one of the hills which abound in this country, look over the Eden-like landscape, and he will at once be converted in the belief that cattle should not run in the woods, and that to preserve Michigan, farmers had better graze a poor man's cow in his own pasture than let it kill his growing timber. Farmers pay as much rent for these copse lands as for the plowed lands and cut them in from 8 to 10 or 12 years according in their wants. It takes longer to raise a hop pole than a hurdle rod; but we turn to other matters. The church of England just now having a convocation and the great matter before them is, what the priest shall wear: 1 I make no comment but inclose a specimen of astonishing puerility. They kicked out John Wesley one hundred years ago, and now are like boys rejecting the clear teachings of the bible, talking of surplices, scarfs, hoods, cope, vestments, such weighty matters, while the farmers are looking on astonished. It would be laughable if it were not such supreme folly. They seem to have totally lost common sense.

Yours,

JAMES ISWOOD

Jay Gould, the great railroad capitalist, is reported to have said within a day or two, that he would give a million dollars to have Gen. Grant in the Presidental chair at this time. He seems to think Grant would be a good man to assist in settling the railroad troubles.

Results of the Pittsburg riot: Two thousand freight cars, with the merchandise on them; destroyed; one hundred and fifty locomotives burned; a dozen important buildings reduced to ashes; fifty lives lost. And this loss of $5,000,000 and fifty lives does not benefit a single striker.

Judging from the present set of the political current there never was more need of keeping the republican party strong and well organized in the northern states than at this time. The safety of the Government may depend upon it. —Augusta (Me.) Journal.

Outside paragraphists are active in predicting a republican defeat in Pennsylvania next election; but they omit to state that the most distressful element is democratic, simply from the fear that the efforts of President Hayes for peace and reform may succeed. These efforts promise well; and if they triumph, the good people of Pennsylvania will be the first to sustain him in very heavy battalions next November, and these good people are wishing God speed everywhere, here and all over the land. —Philadelphia Press.

CODE TO LIGHT.—One year ago the sails from a small pleasure yacht owned by S. M. See and Ben. Campbell, were stolen, and so mysterious was their disappearance that suspicion could not find even a momentary resting place. Early this summer the sails were discovered at Two Rivers, Wis, where they had arrived after passing through many hands. It appears that one Milton Benson stole the sails, sold them to a hand on the scow Blue Belle, and he to parties in Wis. Lately it became known that Benson was on Pine Lake, and a warrant was issued for his arrest, but before it could be served same person notified him of his danger and he fled, but turned up frequently at various places in this vicinity. Sheriff McLeod put deputies upon his track, and the fugitive finally took to the woods north of this place. Two Indians were then deputized to capture him but he managed to elude them and escaped.

The strikers portested vehemently that they intended no violence. Of course, then, it is some other agitator who shakes his fist at the shipper, the mill owner, the carrier, and cries, "you shall pay me two dollars a day, and let that other man starve, or, by heaven you shall do no business at all!" Of course the result is that no business at all is done, and they all starve together.

The Flint Globe estimates the value of the wheat crop in Genesee county, at present market prices, at $1,000,000.

Our County.

Although small in acres of land, Charlevoix county, upon the map draws the eye to its particular spot, as the vision is attracted by an excellent and beautiful spot in nature, a surpassing feature in art, a strikingly beautiful countenance among a large assemblage, or an overtowering, obelisk among a field of monuments. Michigan itself is rich in nature, but there are many points where nature was more lavish in her distribution of blessings than in others. Charlevoix county was one of those places. Into the broad Lake Michigan, like the veins and arteries of the human system our inland waters flow from the heart of our little empire, and upon their bosom, as upon the iron rail, passes down and out the results of toil and capital. Openings for the farmer and the manufacturer are plenty here and we urge upon all embarking in business enterprises to examine our locality.

It is generally supposed that rates on freights will advance immediately It is now beyond all doubt that the railways will have to increase their tariffs, which will from a basis for demanding higher rates for wages. It is to be hoped that we will see vessel men contented yet this fall, and no one the worse for it. This combination of circumstances must create a demand for vessels, and as a consequence, cause a rise in Pine Lake freights. Quite a revival is already noticable at this port, and strong hopes are entertained that our trade will drift back to its old-time activity.

A good lot of six cent prints just received at See & Washburn's.

GOOD TIMES MUST COME.—The estimates of the Agricultural Department place the total of the wheat crop of the United States for the present year at upward of 325,000,000 bushels, 75,000,000 bushels more than that of last year. Of the total quantity fully 100,000,000 bushels will be available for exportation. The cotton prospects were rarely more favorable than they are at present, and it is estimated that the product will be upward of 4,500,000. The sale abroad of the surplus products of the country will undoubtedly have a good effect upon the general bulness interests of the country; and a country with the enormous productiveness of the United States cannot, for any very long period, suffer from "hard times."

For anything that you want to buy cheap, come and see us. See & Washburn.

THE HARBOR WORK.—As we go to press the dredge has completed work, and nothing remains to be done under the present contract but sink the cribs, and complete the shore connection. The channel to a point far inside of the shore line has a width of one hundred feet, and a depth of eleven, while a vessel drawing ten feet can go out with ease. A force of men under Alexander Ross are actively engaged putting together the cribs in Round Lake, and two will be ready to float down to their bed by the middle of the week; the third will not be long to follow. Inspector Barker has already commenced work on the shore connection by shifting the timber of the old south breakwater to the pier line, and just inside the pier bed, and from this to the shore a temporary breakwater of brush and stone will be placed.

A fine lot of groceries just received this morning consisting of tea, coffees, raisins, canned goods and a good many other things at See & Washburns.

Governor Croswell, for his timely, temperate, and firm toned proclamation, and the Governor and Adjutant General Robertson, for their timely and considerate action in placing the three regiments of State militia in their annual encampment just at the neck of the woods, and at the places where, in case of violent outbreaks, the presence of troops would do the most good, are entitled to the thanks of all order-loving citizens of the State

The latter started from Adrianople on the 20th, intending to force a battle with the Russians.

ACCORDING to Constantinople dispatches of the 20th, a levy en masse had been ordered in the Province of Adrianople. The Cossacks had burned several villages in the vicinity of Kasanlik, captured that place and were rapidly advancing upon Philippopolis. A LONDON dispatch of the 21st says the Pope, wishing to place the American Church on an equality with the Church in Europe, had expressed a desire that the Church in the United States should be directly subject to the Pontiff, instead of being governed through the intermediary of a Cardinal Prefect of Propaganda. Cardinal Simeoni was understood to have taken steps in this direction, and concordats were stated to have been concluded and Papal Nuncios appointed.

RADOSL telegrams of the 22d say the Montenegrins, taking advantage of the departure of the bulk of the Turkish troops, had recommenced the bombardment of Niesics.

THE whale-boat New Bedford, manned by Capt. Crapo and his wife, which left New Bedford, Mass., a few weeks ago, reached the British coast on the 22d. Capt. Crapo experienced three gales during the trip, and was obliged to lay by for fifteen days.

ACCORDING to Berlin telegrams of the 23d, the officials at the Russian Embassy in that city had threateningly declared that England's open support of Turkey would release the Czar from the disinterested promises made at Sivadia, and enable him to dictate his own terms of peace.

ORDERS were issued by the Press Bureau, at Constantinople, on the 23d, prohibiting the publication of war news, favorable or unfavorable.

A PESTH dispatch of the 23d says Austria regarded the departure of the Italian fleet for Tarranto with suspicion, and greatly misconceived her professions of neutrality. Austria herself was about to send a fleet to some point adjacent to the Bosphorus, to watch the outcome of the Russian military movements and be prepared to take advantage of circumstances.

THE Turkish troops recrossed the Montenegrin frontier on the 23d, with the object of preventing the expected attack on Nicsics.

DOMESTIC.

THE total assessed value of property in the State of Iowa for 1877 is $388,220,110—a decrease of $1,180,000 since 1875.

PRESIDENT HAYES received a dispatch from Gov. Matthews, of West Virginia, on the 18th, stating that the strikers on the Baltimore & Ohio Road had become so riotous that he was unable to quell the disturbance with the forces at his command, and requesting that United States troops be placed at his disposal to put down the mob. An order was subsequently issued directing troops to be sent immediately to the Governor's assistance. Over 300 men were sent under the command of Gen. French. The President issued a proclamation declaring the condition of affairs in West Virginia, and commanding the rioters to disperse.

IT was reported from Washington, on the 18th, on high official authority, that before taking any further steps toward a recognition of the Blue Government the United States Government would await the promised reparation for the actual invasion and conflict by Mexican troops upon the soil of the United States.

GREAT excitement existed in Washington on the 18th over the threatening situation of affairs throughout the country. At a meeting of the Cabinet it was determined to respond at once to a call from the Governor of Pennsylvania for aid in suppressing the outbreaks in that State, and President Hayes issued a proclamation to that end, calling on the rioters to disperse by or before twelve o'clock, noon, on the 20th.

DURING the progress of the strike in Pittsburgh on the 19th and 20th, the freight depot and general offices of the Pittsburgh, Cincinnati & St. Louis Railroad, and the Union Depot at Pittsburgh belonging to the Pennsylvania Central, were set on fire and badly damaged or destroyed, as were also a number of other railroad buildings and several cars and their contents, involving a loss of several millions of dollars. The number of lives lost as a result of the riotous proceedings reached in the neighborhood of fifty or sixty—including several of the military and scores of the spectators—and a number of other persons—men, women and children—were more or less seriously wounded.

THE strike among railroad employes was spreading and becoming more general on the 19th. A report that the Pittsburgh & Fort Wayne Company had acceded to the demands of the strikers proved incorrect, and the officials of the road declared that there would be no compromise whatever. The officials of the Pennsylvania Central are reported to have taken the same stand, and to have declared that they would not yield though not a wheel should turn on their entire road. Business was generally suspended on the 20th and 21st. The Associated Press says the terrible scenes that had been enacted in the city were traceable to a much lower grade of men than those who inaugurated the strike. Riotous proceedings occurred, on the 23d, in several localities on the roads in New York, Pennsylvania and Ohio, general strikes occurring at Buffalo, Elmira, Columbus, St. Louis, Indianapolis, etc. The Lehigh Valley Railroad bridge at Reading, Pa., was burned, and the track torn up. Four of the rioters were killed, and several wounded, by the military. Property was destroyed in other localities. In Buffalo, an assault was made by nearly 2,000 rioters on about 300 soldiers who were guarding the Lake Shore depot. The military were obliged to leave the building, which was barricaded by the mob, who placed the cars in such a way as to form a defense against attack. An attempt by about fifty soldiers under Col. Flack to retake the building failed, the soldiers being roughly used. Col. Flack was severely injured and was subsequently released on $400 bail. A dispatch late on the evening of the 23d says the town had become perfectly quiet. A number of the strikers had informed the officers of the road that they were willing to go to work, but were afraid to do so. The strike extended during the day to different points along the line of the road. There was also a strike at Pittsburgh, on the Pennsylvania Central, because of an order doubling duties without corresponding forces to run them. At a meeting of the Trainmen's Union resolutions were adopted demanding the pay allowed them prior to June 1 (when a reduction took place) and abolition of the classification of workmen in the different departments heretofore established. Strikes were also threatened on other roads.

A VIRGINIA DISPATCH of the 20th says the strikers had refused the compromise offer of a ten per cent. loan were $72,000,000, of which $19,200,000 were from London. The total subscriptions were $26,152,800.

THE Governor of Pennsylvania issued a proclamation, on the 20th, against the various demonstrations on the line of the Pennsylvania Central, and the military were called out to be in readiness to quiet all disturbance. The strikers at Pittsburgh seem determined to maintain their position and keep the road in a blockade, in defiance of the military, if necessary.

A TERRIBLE riot occurred at Baltimore, Md., on the 20th, growing out of the strike on the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad. News had been received in that city that all the freight trains had been stopped at Cumberland, and the cross taken from them by the strikers. Gov. Carroll at once issued a proclamation, calling upon all citizens to desist from lawlessness, and on order to Gen. Herbert to proceed with the Fifth Regiment of his command to Cumberland, to quell the riot there. The Sixth Regiment was also subsequently ordered to assemble. As three companies of the latter, under Capt. Tapper, were marching from the armory, along the line of the road, to Camden Station, to proceed to Cumberland, the soldiers were stoned and fired into by a crowd on the streets. The companies fired into the crowd, and a number were killed and wounded. The greatest excitement existed in the city, between 1,000 and 5,000 people being congregated around the armory building. Four or five of the soldiers were knocked senseless by the missiles thrown by the crowd before they could form, the soldiers, on account of the firing without orders to do so. The depot at Camden Station was set on fire by the rioters, and the soldiers were ordered to fire upon the crowd. Two BOOKS.

For some time I have been meditating a paper on this topic. But there have been certain, spalling difficulties in the way. I have had a very uncomfortable presentiment that I might not be well able to treat this subject, unless in a very stiff way, without in some manner turning my heart inside out. All that might be very easy in a certain sense, but there is an inner sanctum sanctorum in every one's nature, which a sensitive spirit is very slow in opening up to the gaze of the mob. I am quite sure, that in this fugitive fragment, I shall not use any unnecessary circumlocution, to avoid the use of the honest pronoun I. There is no more upright character than that same up and down vowel. That straight and perpendicular character, the symbol of upright manhood, has been a standing target for much spiteful and senseless criticism. I confess there is a little (I am not sure but my little really means a good deal) spirit of combativeness in my composition, that prompts me to a gallant defense of the subject of outrage. I have long been of the opinion, and I have my modicum of satisfaction in giving it a corporeal expression, that egotism by no means consists in this simple vocalization. The circumstances, alone, must determine that. Cæsar wrote his celebrated commentaries in the third person, yet who that has read him, but remembers his braggadocio in the close of his first book. His egotism is poorly disguised by his flimsy lace.

I was born with a love of books. Of course this affirmation is the result of a logical deduction. Long ago, as I can remember, I esteemed books as most desirable companions. My subsequent affection may be somewhat wiser, and reach out so as to include many other objects, but is no less genuine and intense. It assumes more the character of a sieve, allowing a great amount of weak brained sentimental stuff to go through. It is but another instance of the survival of the fittest. I now have an assignable reason why I delight in the society of these wise corporations. at the first I had no guide but instinct, for I verily believe there was a great deal of divinity in it, rough hewn or otherwise.

Last summer, I stood beneath the hill where the first—and I might as well add, in some respects, the most important event in my biography occurred. The old house that sheltered more than sixteen years of my precious life was gone; not a vestige challenged recognition. The prints of Vandal hands were everywhere. I will not signify that there was no spirit of hostility, grasping a keen Damascus, in my nature. Be that as it may, I was permitted to behold a wonderful exposition, whose sacred chambers have never yet been thrown open to the world. It was a sort of demi-semi-centennial, with a tapering plus of annuals tacked on. No doubt, there were some confusion among the wares in that wonderful palace of Aladdin, for it was an extemporaneous affair. I cannot of course now reproduce the exact pose of my cogitations. But I do remember, that the old ancestral library was, for the most part blank as an idiot's stare and my soul did fret exceedingly at the straitness of its dimensions. The volumes in anywise adopted to my years, did not recline upon the shelf unthumbed. I found disposition to execute many an exploring expedition, into the labyrinths of a literature, not purely juvenile. I sometimes found many thorns for a few roses but that inbred passion, never has turned the cruel heel upon me. I do not know but toilsome meandering through the lonely wilderness, was just the discipline I needed to fit me for the region beyond. I only know it was via dolorosa. Even the memory has a melancholy hue. No wonder, then at some of my petty idiosyncrasies. From those days gaunt and grim as a frightful dromn, down to the year one of our second centennial, I have experienced the pangs of purgatory, when I have been detained with no special employment, beneath some wayside roof, destitute of any accessable literature, but of the scantiest and stalest sort. An old almanac, dog eared and fly specked; a stray and disputated Detroit Office organ, well blanketed with cobwebs, or months old newspaper, coarse and smirched with unbasked bread, or other equally unsavory viands have been clutched up eagerly, in a vain attempt to reason the "dull, flat and unprofitable" hours. I have found many specimens answering to Plato's definition of man, who excuse themselves from patronizing, even, the weekly paper, on the score that they have no doubt some of these vegetable hulks are honest, though not the noblest of God's works, Pope to the contrary notwithstanding; but I do not believe them after all.

Day after day I have followed the patient ox in the logging hollow, and the old fashioned cradle in the harvest field, and performed other similar hum of prosaic life. I know something of physical weariness and the clods it lays upon the spirit. I never saw the time when I could not find time to devour more than one paper in a week, and feel the better for it. Under such circumstances, I have consumed more than one portly volume when I had to hide away in the night to do it, and I have as yet found no place for repentance. Again and again I have gone miles, afoot, to the township library, not overstocked nor too well selected, and lugged to and fro its precious freight. I had then some seasons of joy, though too often I had to trade away my jewels in musty cheap ber books, and peruse them in sunshine, at untoward seasons. My pleasure was purchased at a cost. Perhaps the gratification was none the less intense on that account. That humble case of books in the clerk's office, was to me a mint of gold. I remember, I obtained two volumes, of the four or more of James Prior's Edition of Oliver Goldsmith. I am hardly sure I have seen the rest since. There was much to inspire. In one of his papers on the belleslettre, was an honest avowal, contrary to popular proverb. I will not characterize it here, but its influence has tinged all my subsequent life with a rainbow of delight. And I chance to know I am not the only one indebted to poor Oliver for the formation of literary taste.

It is amazing to me how stupid some people are with reference to books. To them books are books, books are nothing more. They have no charms in the matter contained. They are geometrical figures done up in goat skins or sheep skins, to be laid away upon the shelf like any other mantel ornament, or to be toyed by vicious children. A young woman once, it is said, inherited a large pecuniary fortune. After a long list of expenditures had been indulged, she bethought her that her new station would require a library. The poor fool waited upon a tradesman for the coveted decorations. The bookseller politely inquired what kind of books she desired. She naively replied that she guessed she would take red ones. Query. Were her books read after she procured them?

I own I have a penchant for bookstores and public libraries, and for that matter, private ones too when they come in my way. A tyranical purse cannot keep me away, though it may inflict inquisitorial torments after I am there. In those great quarries of learning, it is an indescribable satisfaction, to even peep over the titles. Somehow one's soul is expanded by so doing. I know a pilgrimage to the literary mecca, does not harass ones self esteem. Humility outranks pride in the consciousness of the great monarchs of human thought.

I love books with an ardor that time and his cohorts have never yet succeeded in blunting. I am not alone in my devotions. Almost every trony great man has indulged, freely, in this class of amours. Gibbon is represented as saying that he would not exchange his love of books for the wealth of the Indies, and Montesquien that there was no trouble, no chagrin, he couldont escape in his library. And thus through all the alphabet to the forty thousanth izzard. The reviewers, awhile since, found a choice morsel for the literary epicure, in the Life and Letters of Lord Macaulay, which they were not slow in serving up. He is represented as being an intense lover of books, which he esteemed as the best of anodynes, and longing for burial in an immense library "and never pass a waking hour without a book." During an eventful period of his career he wrote "Even now I dare not, in the inval of business, remain alone for a minute without a book in my hand." When we consider that books constitute the treasury of human wisdom, we may not wonder at the devotions of the philosophically inclined.

THE RIOTS IN PITTSBURGH.

An Account of the Fighting Between the Soldiers and the Strikers.

Telegraphic dispatches of July 22 give the following account of the fighting between the military forces and the railroad strikers and their sympathizers in Pittsburgh:

The Philadelphia troops were under command of Gen. Brinton, and were met by Sheriff Fife, who was killed in the engagement of the day. It was known that he had in his possession warrants for the arrest of a large number of the ringleaders, and from that moment he was a marked man. The Sheriff preceded the military with a posse, and at 3 40 o'clock the combined forces moved from the Union Depot along the railroad track in the direction of what was then the scene of the disturbance. This was at the Twenty-eighth street crossing, where the conditions is located. As the Sheriff's handful of men advanced to the crossing they found the tracks blockaded with strikers. The Sheriff found it impossible with his small force, to make the streets of the leaders, here the fight began. The crowd was immense, choking the crossing and extending up the hillside. The strikers occupied the contested ground. Beyond them were thousands of persons, many of whom had been gathered as much out of curiosity as out of sympathy for the belligerent brakemen. When the Philadelphia troops arrived, the house within the Fourteenth Pittsburgh, was on the ground, and there was no disturbance. The mob seemed to be infuriated at the soldiers from the eastern part of the State.

The Black Hussars of Philadelphia were commanded to clear the crossing. The crowd at once understood the situation. As the troops advanced, dismounted and fixed bayonets, they were assailed from all sides with a perfect torrent of stones that were showered down from the hills upon them. Some of the soldiers were injured, and the order was given to fire. The first volley was aimed above the heads of the men, and doubtless the number of citizens wounded on the hill side is to be attributed to this cause. The mob continued their assaults on the soldiers, and a number of those who seemed to be ringleaders were seen to use pistols. But few of the troops were injured by this discharge, the wounded having received their injuries from the rocks hurled by the strikers.

An indescribable scene followed these demonstrations. The loose militia, when ordered to fire, fell on their faces and did not fire a gun. The fusillading from the troops brought the crowd to a standstill. Then came a cessation for a little. Then a dash was made, but the troops held their own, although the result was in certain for a few minutes. The panic spread, and the prosecution soon became general.

When the smoke lifted, it was ascertained that fourteen persons had been killed and a large number wounded. Several members of the local militia were killed, and there was great excitement, and much indignation was expressed freely in that west was termed "this new outrage."

There was a lull after this encounter, the mob seemingly resting from the cross ing. The strikers then moved in the direction of the arsenal. Their expressed purpose was to secure the arms and ammunition with which to retaliate on the troops. To make up, own gunshops were ransacked and guns, and ammunition and stampede followed as the rioters retired.

The train at six o'clock, were in command of the militia, but nothing was done to start any of the trains. When the encounter between the militia and the mob occurred the Seventeenth Regiment arrived, and returned to the city. The crowds on the South Side began to reassemble again in the evening. At eight o'clock the concourse was not less than 10,000 strong. The rendezvous was the roundhouse. The mob had unconsciously swung, and came back to the field of the first fight more determined than ever. They marched down Fifth avenue to the number of 3,000. Drums were beating and flags were flying. The soldiers were completing to prepare to fight. Cars were run through the frenzied mass of humanity clamoring for their blood. The structure was set on fire, but did not burn as rapidly as was desired, and the task, lest on revenge, rushed out on the road and sent burning trains toward the Loomel Building.

From midnight until five o'clock this morning the main efforts of the crowd were directed to firing the building and cars, but about half an hour later the mob, which had been besieging the military, left for some unexplained reason. This afforded the troops, who were in actual danger of being roasted alive, an opportunity to emerge from the roundhouse, and they succeeded in reaching Liberty street in a very few moments. They quietly formed in line and marched up to Thirty-third street, and thence to Pennsylvania avenue and Butler street. Their objective point was the United States Arsenal on Butler street, where they expected to obtain shelter. While turning into Butler street, however, the leaders of the mob discovered them, and fully 1,000 men, armed and supplied with ammunition, followed in pursuit.

Some of the troops fired at citizens, either accidentally or intentionally, as they moved along, and this added fury to the cry for revenge. When they reached the arsenal the commandant refused to admit them. He said he had but ten men, and would be powerless to hold the place if the mob should attack it. He counseled to take care of the wounded, and they were accordingly carried into the hospitals. The main body of the troops continued their march on Butler street, a fusillade being kept up on them by the mob as they moved forward. The shots find a killing one of the soldiers before they reached the arsenal, and nearly opposite the cemetery gate, fully a mile above the arsenal, two others were left lying on the sidewalk. They continued their flight and crossed over to the north side of the Allegheny River on the Sharpsburg bridge, the mob following them as rapidly as possible. After reaching the north side the troops scattered, and in this way the mob was divided into very small bodies.

To the meantime the city was in a state of anarchy. Thousands who had not joined in the pursuit of the fleeing troops gathered about the burning buildings and trains, and assisted in spreading the flames wherever they had not been applied. By seven o'clock the fire had extended from Millvale Station to Twentieth street and enveloped hundreds of cars, the extensive machine shops, two roundhouses, the depots, and offices of the Union Transfer Company, blacksmith shops, storehouses and numerous buildings making up the terminal facilities of the mammoth corporation. In the roundhouses were 125 first class locomotives, which had been housed in consequence of the strike. These were totally destroyed, but even the depot, which was built with stone, was not the mere stone is but a trifle in the aggregate damage done.

The scenes transpiring on Liberty street, along the line of which the tracks of the railroads run, simply beggar description. While hundreds were engaged in firing the cars and making certain of the destruction of the valuable buildings at the outer depot, thousands of men, women and children engaged in pillaging the cars.

Men armed with heavy sledges were breaking open the cars, and then the contents would be thrown out and carried off by those engaged in pillaging the train. Scenes of terror existing. The street was almost completely blockaded by persons intending to carry off the plunder they had gathered together. In hundreds of instances wagons were pressed into service to enable the thieves to get away with their goods. Mayor McCarthy, early in the day, endeavored to stop the pillage, but the hand-ful of men at his command were unable to control the crowd, who were desperate in their anxiety to secure goods. At one time the pillage was checked, but the mob fired the cars and then proceeded with the work of destruction. It is impossible to form any idea of the amount of goods stolen, but hundreds of thousands would not cover the loss.

How Custer Died.

Howard talked with the camp followers regarding the Custer massacre, and disclosed some new facts. This body of hostiles, or a portion of it, was with Sitting Bull in that shocking affair, and thus the story that Howard relates may be depended upon—as they, not suspecting his guise, is among them and in consultation with his residence among and relationship with Sitting, talked to him as one of themselves. They state that many of Custer's men were killed by mounted Indians, who rushed in and killed them with their knives. The poor fellows were huddled together here and there, and fought at great disadvantage, as they killed a great many of their assailants, fighting desperately in this fashion. Sitting Bull assured that the battle lasted but thirty minutes all told, ending with the death of Custer and a few men and officers who had rallied around him. Then the forlorn hope had gotten off some distance, and could have escaped; but, unfortunately, Custer thought the day was theirs, turned, and ordered a charge, and the devoted party rushed upon the Indians with revolvers, shooting down the astonished savages right and left. Custer killed five himself, when his pistol emptied, and the fire pressing about him, he closed with a grappling savage, and, beating out his brains with the butt, was shot as his victim fell to the ground. This doubtless true story supports the theory advanced by military men at the time of the massacre, that the deeds of some desperate that not receiving support from the position and location of the groups of the battle-field Custer, viz., That he, seeing his command annihilated, and fearing to face the consequences or scorning to live when his soldiers lay dead about him, had deliberately rushed to certain death.

His body was not recognized at first, the Indians thinking him a scout; but being soon identified, all that remained of the famous General was propped up against the corpses of two soldiers, and so left to receive the scorching but too late response. Poor Tom Custer's heart was not cut out, as previously reported, but he was barbarously killed with knives. Lieut. Sturgess was knocked off his horse, shot and killed, his body stripped and thrown into the river. It must be Sturgess' death which is thus described, as the Indians tell of this poor fellow as a young warrior who rode with a buckskin coat strapped to his saddle, and it is known that he was so equipped. They also relate that two soldiers, who threw down their guns and surrendered, were set free and advised to return to their people and tell them all the whites would follow Custer unless they would let the Sioux alone." The poor fellows fled, but the next day, probably crazy from fright, attempted to return, when they encountered some Indians who had been engaged against Reno, and were killed. Howard recognized many Custer trophies in the camp, among them Cooke's saddle and accoutrements. He thinks this camp of hostiles must be severely dealt with; that Sitting Bull must be secured or killed, or else the season's success and surrenders will go almost for naught. I am convinced that Gen. Miles shares this opinion, at least partially, and that he is right in opposing any cessation of active offensive operations until the suggested results be studied. It must not be imagined that he is bloodthirsty in his plans or ideas in this long-drawn-out contrary, he recognizes the fact that the Sioux even has rights the Government must respect; but at the same time he feels with all intelligent observers that its strong arm must now thoroughly assert itself before the field be abandoned. Any other course can but result in loss of all that has been gained, and endless repetition of campaigns against the Indians.—N. Y. Tribune.

—Only three persons have lifepasses on the Hudson River Railroad. One is John B. Jervis, the first engineer of the road, another is his wife, and the third is Gov. Knubull, of West Point. The passes are made of solid silver, on which is engraved the name of the holder, date when given, and occupation.

INCIDENTS AND ACCIDENTS.

—Barry Sullivan had his eyeball cut open, and from it there was taken an eyelash, which had been thrust in at the point of the sword.

—At Newport, N. Y., on the occasion of the recent celebration of the Fourth, a large quantity of fire works was accidentally exploded and a Mrs. Parkhurst had her face frightfully lacerated by a fire-rocket. Her death was considerably expected at last accounts.

—At Wendell, Mass., on the 14th, an engine and caboose, on the Fitchburg Railroad, ran into a train crossing the track and killed Ira Davis, Mrs. Josiah Davis (his mother), Mrs. J. a Wakefield, Mrs. Eugene Brown and Miss Nellie Lacey. Mrs. Brown lived half an hour. The others were killed instantly and badly cut up.

The locomotive was not running at very great speed. The party were returning home from a herrying.

—There has been another fatal case of hydrophobia at Hartford, and this time at the same time disagreement among the doctors over its reality. Daniel Braboun's daughter Annie, four years and a half old, was bitten by a dog six weeks ago, and last week she died, after undergoing for three days all the symptoms of the terrible disease. Some doctors declined to make a post mortem examination of the child's body, but when they appeared at the door with the case of post mortem instruments the fourteen years old brother of the child could not bear to see it, and drove them away with a loaded revolver and vowed he would kill the first man who touched his sister's body. The post-mortem was indefinitely postponed. —Hartford (Conn.) Post.

—A Hazardville correspondent tells of a novel wager recently won in that town. A party of men being together, one of them proposed a bet that Peter Toombs would whistle one hour, without stopping or speaking, and without repeating any tune. The proposal was made by another of the party, who reduced the time to half an hour. Mr. Toombs accepted the amendment, the stakes were put up, and Mr. Toombs began his task. Beginning with "I Won't Go Home Till Morning," he ran through his repertoire, ending with "Paddle Your Own Canoe," in grand style. When the half hour was ended, not being blown, the whistler kept on up twenty minutes longer, winning, of course, the stakes.—Hartford Times.

—A case of some interest to farmers of skimmilk's proflictions was lately tried at Glencoe, N. Y., before Justice Peck. President of the Discovery Dairy complaint against Wm. Cowan for watering the milk which he supplied to the factory. On the trial it was shown that the milk supplied by him at several times registered from eighty-five to ninety degrees on the lactometer, while the average was known to have been about 100 degrees. The Directors, with the consent of Cowan, had Cowan's cows milked, and the testing by the lactometer showed it to register about 100 degrees. Mr. Cowan then signed a document, agreeing to deliver pure milk hereafter, or pay a forfeit of five cents per milk. He attributed the excess of water to carelessness in milking, and promised that the milk should have been put with the milk. Mr. Cowan was fined $5, and $7.50 costs.

The refreshments which prevailed deserved seriously from the balcony canopy to the canal.

In the coal mines of Illinois and Pennsylvania only is the strike still maintained with any degree of vigor. Almost every railroad in the country is now in full operation, and the work of arresting and trying the ringleaders has begun. As a rule the men have gained nothing by the strike, while the roads are in a better condition than before to deal liberally with them.

On the 5th inst. Fred Hanson, Schram, Ont., was burned. Seventeen of the 19 inmates were burned to death, and several who escaped were badly burned.

GERMAN COLOGNES FOR CHARLEVOIX COUNTY.—Messrs A. Hoppe, of Philadelphia, Randolph Zeiger, M. Nebel, Fr. Tower, Abel Louis Stecker, of Winchland, N. J., recently visited the eastern portion of our county, and located a large tract on the G. R. & I. R. R. R. lands between Boyne Falls and the head of Pine Lake, in Antrim and for a German colony recently formed in Philadelphia. The original purpose of this colony was to locate in Kansas, but the above named R. R. Co., ever on the alert to improve the country along the line of their road, induced the agents of the colony to visit and examine this section. The result is that our beautiful country has captivated them, and it is Michigan instead of Kansas. The colony will number about 100 families of sturdy, industrious, honest Germans, and will prove a valuable acquisition to our county and region. One or two sections of the land will be occupied this fall. We commend the wisdom of the committee in locating their colony at the point they did. The lands are high and dry, with a soil of inexhaustible richness, with numerous springs of clear cold water. The location with a railroad upon one side, and a navigable feeder of the great lake thoroughfare upon the other is one eminently desirable, and must eventually prove a rich country. Contrary to the plan of many who do not take the pains to investigate, our climate is not as cold as its northern location would perhaps indicate, but on the contrary the climatic influences of waters modify the severity of the winters. The ground never freezes, and the sultry, melting summer weather of more southern localities is never known here. Let more who contemplate western emigration take a trip of observation in this direction.

A SAD AFFAIR. On Thursday last an event occurred which took from this late a young maiden full of life and vigor and brought sorrow to a community. While Misses Mary and Lizzie Whitford were crossing the Arm near Little Island, Lizzie, in some manner fell from the boat into the water. In her efforts to save her sister—which cost the accomplished Mary was drowned. The body was recovered the following day. She was a young lady universally esteemed. The event has cast a shadow of gloom over the entire neighborhood.

DISTRICT BEAR TRAPPER.—The people in the vicinity of Advance were much excited on Saturday evening over the appearance of a huge bear. Immediately a brigade was summoned mounted cavalry, Thomas Biggs, Amos Bates and Dan Smith. Infantry, armed with Spencer rifles, Horace Wood, John Sherry, and Sidney Ingalsbe. Sharp shooter James Healey and George Wood, armed with pitch forks and axes. Force only four infantry on hand, thinking that flight was his only resort, but one lone little dog kept the trail, and six minutes before seven of the same evening this mighty son of the forest surrendered both soul and body to Two jack knives which were hurried in his throat. Wounded.—George Wood, in the hand, by one stray buck shot.

MARINE.—The schooner Mary, loaded with wood and bark for A. Fox, & Co., left this port about 4 p. m., on Thursday, and soon after was seen lying a signal of distress. The tug Corkin went to her assistance and found her waterlogged, having sprung a leak soon after leaving port. She was towed to the mouth of the river and her cargo discharged. She will undoubtedly leave light. She is an old vessel, and is commanded by Capt. Stretch, who took the Pandora to Liverpool last winter.

The tug Stacey Brothers, needing repairs, was relieved by the tug E. D. Holton, owned by the same company, on Wednesday and proceeded to Milwaukee. She will report, on her return from the last into the water. In her efforts to save her sister—

DOMESTIC.

AT Washington, on the 26th, the Executive Committee of St. George's Association of North America, through a representative, held a conference with Secretary Evarts, and read a series of resolutions recommending arbitration for the settlement of the existing railroad troubles. Mr. Evarts expressed a general approval of the principles of arbitration, and promised to give the matter due consideration.

THE Treasury Department, on the 27th, issued the fifty-third call for the redemption of 5-20 bonds of 1865. The call is for $10,000,000 consols of 1865, of which $3,000,000 are registered and $7,000,000 coupon bonds, principal and interest to be paid at the Treasury on and after the 27th of October next, interest to cease on that day.

THE Central Council of the Labor League of the United States, headquarters at Washington, on the 27th, transmitted a petition to the President of the United States, urging that steps be taken immediately to end the existing labor trouble, restore traffic, law and order. They opposed any compromise with the actual rioters, or those countenancing riot, and think the Executive should call the prominent railroad men and the leaders of the labor organizations of the country together, to effect a compromise of the difficulties between them. The petition also sets forth that any further lawful resistance of the railroads to the detriment of the business of the Nation would justify the Government in taking possession of the roads and running them in the interest of the people, as well as that of the companies.

THERE were some disturbance reported from eastern points, on the 27th, but the general outlook was favorable to a resumption of railroad traffic at an early day, under the protection of military and civil authorities where necessary. Arrests were being made in many cities of leaders of the riotous gangs. The strikers on the Pittsburgh, Fort Wayne & Chicago Railroad, at Pittsburgh, had agreed to turn over to the Company the rolling stock which they had been controlling for several days. Freight trains had started east and west from Harrisburgh on the Pennsylvania Road, and a number of men had resumed work in the shops of that Company.

NEWS from the Black Hills region, on the 27th, was to the effect that the Indians were attacking settlements in that country and murdering the people.

NO SERIOUS conflict between the rioters and the authorities occurred in Chicago during the day or night of the 27th. A list of the killed and wounded resulting from the strike in that city foots up about eighteen or twenty of the former, and about sixty of the latter. Eight policemen received wounds of a somewhat serious nature, several others slightly hurt. Railroads were resuming business, and freight and passenger trains were being started out all the time. A large number of arrests were made in St. Louis on the 27th. The authorities expressed confidence that the worst of the riots was over. An Indianapolis (Ind.) dispatch says the strike in that city might be considered at an end. Reports of a favorable nature were received, on the morning of the 28th, from other Western points—the strikers, while still holding out in many quarters, refraining from riotous demonstrations. The Governor of Illinois called on the President for troops on the 27th.

A Pittsburgh dispatch of the 29th announces that the freight blockade there was pretty well broken. The strikers on the Pennsylvania Central and Fort Wayne Roads were subdued, but offered no resistance to the movement of trains. The strikers were firm, and claimed that the roads could not resume full operations for want of men. A train of cars containing soldiers under command of Gen. Hartranft, who accompanied them, was met at Johnstown by a large mob, who attacked the cars by throwing stones and pieces of metal in the windows. Several soldiers were injured by the missiles. The train was shocked up just before reaching a misplaced switch, but the engine, tender, two baggage and three passenger cars left the track and collided with a car purposely placed in the way by the strikers. Col. John Hamilton, of the First United States Artillery, was seriously injured in the side, and several soldiers were badly bruised by the concussion. The soldiers of the wrecked train succeeded in arresting about 100 of the rioters. The trouble in the mining regions of Pennsylvania continued on the 28th, all the mines being abandoned and the companies paying off their employés preparatory to operating either their mines or their roads.

A RIOT was current at Yankton D. T., on the 26th, that the Indians has massacred all the inhabitants at Fort Pierre.

A SIOUX CITY (Iowa) dispatch of the 28th says lengthy answers of grasshoppers had been filed over that place in an easterly direction during the day, but few alighting in that neighborhood.

TRAINS were started under military protection on the Chicago & Alton Road at East St. Louis, on the 29th. Large quantities of the rioters were arrested at different points in the West, on the 28th and 29th. James Hardy, a prominent Internationalist, Peter Lofgreen, Chairman of the Strikers' Executive Committee, and C. H. Loden, a negro, who led the levee rabble—all of St. Louis—being among the number. All was comparatively quiet in Chicago, the city being still guarded by the militia and regular and special police. The engineers of the Vandalia Road struck on the night of the 28th, and attempted to prevent trains passing through Terre Haute. They were consequently remodelled their action, and decided to go to work on the 30th. Freight trains began moving on many of the Western roads on the 29th, but the strikers still held out in a majority of cases, and opposed the moving of trains. All was reported quiet at San Francisco.

THE Secretary of the United States Treasury has recently stated that the new 4 per cent bonds having been issued to exchange for gold coin, they cannot be considered by anything but gold coin or its full equivalent.

A WASHINGTON special, of the 30th ult., says the news received there from all quarters was of a reassuring character, and it was hoped that no further aid would have to be granted to State Governments for the preservation of peace, and that the Federal troops employed in the various railroads throughout the country would soon be relieved from that duty.

SEVERAL arrests of rioters were made at different points throughout the country on the 30th ult.

AN EXTRA (Pa.) telegram of the 30th ult. announces that freight and passenger trains were running on all roads centering in that city.

THE Delaware, Lackawanna & Western strikers, in Pennsylvania, unconditionally resolved, on the 30th ult., to return to work at once, the reduced wages, and trains commenced running in all directions from Scranton. The miners' and iron-workers' strike still continued.

THE Pittsburgh Commercial Gazette says the damage done to railroad and other property in that city, during the recent riots, would reach from $8,000,000 to $10,000,000 in amount, which will have to be paid for by the county. Several suits have already been commenced. Another Pittsburgh paper says the amount, divided up among the taxpayers, will give a $218 for each taxable person in the county.

FREIGHT trains were running on all the roads out of Pittsburgh, on the 30th ult., and met with little or no opposition.

THE inquiry into the causes which led to the death of ten persons in the riot at Baltimore, on the 20th, when the Sixth Regiment fired into the mob, began in that city on the 30th ult. The testimony showed that several soldiers were knocked down before any shooting took place by them, and that long feed without rations from the Odenal.

SERVANT of the miners in the Cumberland (Md.) district struck for an increase of wages on the 30th ult. A general strike was threatened.

SEVERAL ringleaders of the crowds engaged in stopping trains on the Toledo, Peoria & Warsaw Railroad in Illinois, were brought before Judge Drummond in Chicago on the 30th ult., to show cause why they should not be punished for contempt of the Federal Court, that road being in the hands of a receiver appointed by the United States Circuit Court.

A COLUMBUS (Ohio) dispatch of the 30th ult. says the strikers there had completed control of the Columbus, Chicago & Indiana Central Yards, and prevented all freight trains from leaving.

The End of a Romantic Attachment.

Some of the Sunday papers are giving details of a very extraordinary suit case which will shortly be submitted for trial. The story is this. The daughter of a country practitioner in a little village in Scotland awoke one morning to find herself a great heiress. The traditions, maxims, which had come from Judas with a forgiven heart, leaving a handful of money and fully $1,500,000 in money and West Indian property to his niece, Miss Macchuckie.

At that time she was bright, clever, handsome and about twenty-one years of age. She was possessed of her property, and lived in great style, keeping a large stud of horses, and driving tandem herself all over the country. Her father and mother she took under her wing, and was devoted to them to the last day of their lives. She established them in an independent and elegant house near Edinburgh, but had been a great deal with herself at Aberlour House, at the days she.

Some fifteen years ago a young lady came to pay her a visit. She was a stranger to Miss Grant, and was brought by mutual friends. It ended in this young lady, Miss Temple, leaving father and mother, with their entire concurrence, and living with Miss Grant, for better or for worse, until death should them part; in fact they formed such a friendship that they never could married into an engagement that neither should marry, and that they should pass their lives together. Miss Grant has since refused a very good offer of marriage, and rejected all other suitors. The conditions were that Miss Grant was to be mistress of the house, and everything to Miss Temple of Miss Temple on her part never left her and never married. A will was made by Miss Grant, under which Her property was to pass to the Temples.

Two years ago Miss Temple married. Last Christmas Miss Grant died. The will was revoked. She never forgave the defection. He never made any visits, and the estate goes to an obscure country doctor in Aberdeenshire, who hardly knew he was related to Miss Grant, and should not be punished for contempt of the Federal Court, that road being in the hands of a receiver appointed by the United States Circuit Court.

The daughter of a country practitioner in a little village in Scotland awoke one morning to find herself a great heiress. The traditions, maxims, which had come from Judas with a forgiven heart, leaving a handful of money and fully $1,500,000 in money and West Indian property to his niece, Miss Macchuckie.

At that time she was bright, clever, handsome and about twenty-one years of age. She was possessed of her property, and lived in great style, keeping a large stud of horses, and driving tandem herself all over the country. Her father and mother she took under her wing, and was devoted to them to the last day of their lives. She established them in an independent and elegant house near Edinburgh, but had been a great deal with herself at Aberlour House, at the days she.

Some fifteen years ago a young lady came to pay her a visit. She was a stranger to Miss Grant, and was brought by mutual friends. It ended in this young lady, Miss Temple, leaving father and mother, with their entire concurrence, and living with Miss Grant, for better or for worse, until death should them part; in fact they formed such a friendship that they never could married into an engagement that neither should marry, and that they should pass their lives together. Miss Grant has since refused a very good offer of marriage, and rejected all other suitors. The conditions were that Miss Grant was to be mistress of the house, and everything to Miss Temple of Miss Temple on her part never left her and never married. A will was made by Miss Grant, under which Her property was to pass to the Temples.

Two years ago Miss Temple married. Last Christmas Miss Grant died. The will was revoked. She never forgave the defection. He never made any visits, and the estate goes to an obscure country doctor in Aberdeenshire, who hardly knew he was related to Miss Grant, and should not be punished for contempt of the Federal Court, that road being in the hands of a receiver appointed by the United States Circuit Court.

The train hands, learning that he could swim, threw him into the Morris Canal, for the purpose of extinguishing the flames. He had probably been disabled by the burns, and, instead of ashore, sank. The Great Regulator.

SIMMONS' LIVER REGULATOR is summer is the season of the year, above all others, when the liver needs to be kept in order, and severe and dangerous bilious attacks frequently follow. The principal cause of all sickness at this season of the year has its origin in a disordered Liver, the great regulator of the system, which, if deranged in time, great suffering, wretchedness and Death will ensue. A little precaution taken in time, in the shape of a reliable and always-Liver Regulator, will in most cases prevent illness and fatal consequences. No medicine in modern times has gained such a world-wide reputation and real merit as SIMMONS' LIVER REGULATOR, manufactured by J. H. ZEILIN & CO., the Chemical Laboratory, Philadelphia. It acts specially on the Liver, promotes digestion and fortifies the system against malarial diseases.

MARY ANN'S MIND.

The kitchen loves the Chaser gal,
The markered loves the sea,
And I love Mary Ann!
Mary Ann, Mary Ann, Mary Ann,
Mary Ann, Mary Ann, I love!

Jake Hazard smoked out his match of sea song at the tapped his pleasant nose, as he pushed his chair within reach of the beach, on the relinquishment rollers, and at last launched her in the water.

"That's the style!" inquired Hoey Long, with a comic cast of his eye across the boat at Jake, as he shoved at her other side with brawny shoulders and deep breaths of effort.

"Hey, Jake?" cried Jake, "Ain't you small, Hoey? I expect you'd see through a miniature quick's the next minute!"

Hoey grinned horribly; he was not a brilliant creature, but he could catch fish better than any man on the shore, and when you go fishing that's the sort of companion you want.

Now, everybody in Sandy Creek knew Jake Hazard was guretally in love with Mary Ann Tucker; he had made no secret of it; and she, being a born coquette, treated Jake in out-and-mostly fashion till he was as nearly crazy as a hard-headed young fellow with no nerves and a mighty digestion can possibly be. I said Mary Ann was the prettiest girl in the town I should do her great injustice; for she was the only pretty girl there; the three or three tanned, freckled, good-natured daughters of the two lawyers, and Parkers, and Conklins, who were "the girls" of Sandy Creek, never pretended to be pretty; they went their way in a homely, dingy claims, linked short-cakes, muslin chamber, and darned stockings, undisturbed by lovers or rivalry; in due time one married a married them, became everybody could marry Mary Ann, and thereafter they lived Sandy Creek as a matter of course. Mary Ann's text, sooner or later, every young man in the town kessed down and fell.

Then she was the "cherished sensual," and had a right to be proud of her conquest. She was an heiress in her own right, being the only child of a well-to-do farmer, whose farm adjoined the village, less coy and unsenful than the beauty of Sandy Creek. But Jake Hazard combined nutbrid, his nature was strong and true. The quips and cranks of his fun and good humor were but the cross of finer bells on a forceful and opulent depth, a constant and mighty tide setting toward one shore. Perhaps Mary Ann did not perceive this fact; perhaps she thought him gay and careless, as young men are apt to be. It certainly never crossed her mind, as a reasonable question, whether she meant to marry Jake; or even if he meant to marry her, before his part the matter was thoroughly settled, though till to-day he had never proposed in words.

"Pretty good, pretty good!" Jake shouted back to him, setting his teeth together in a short, sharp contest with the biggest blue fish of the kind, who in another minute lay flapping and beating at Hoey's feet.

"Bring it all that's a most item teased fish, Jake!"

"Only the eighth-dinner, old fellar."

"Well, now," said Hoey, keep the boat trimmed carefully while Jake reloads, and don't get wet in the crowded boat, I tell you, before I tell you, brilled on the coals, or buttered up, long o' a good fish dinner, and nothing else."

Hoey paused and gloated on the fine fat fish with blinking green eyes and broad red face, that was the picture of good humor. Then he took to speech again.

"If you'd got an odd woman now, Jake, to your house, you'd have the round head a fine place for a wife, I'm going to know that Jake Hazard's mothin' to me, me! I shan't point to cotton to no man because he's lonesome, I can be masterful myself, if I'm a mind to, so there." With which shake out of her big she slammed back her head and set her face, and that dejected look of Jake's home, not of—

"Oh, mother, mothin' much, nothin' particular, only I was you I wouldn't be the one to get all 'an o' Jake's home, not of—

"I'll bet you to know, sir," snapped Mary Ann, the quick color flashing and she brave, "you're growing cheeky. "I'll bet you

WILLARD A. SMITH, EDITOR AND PROPRIETOR.

TUESDAY, AUGUST 14, - - 1877.

From the Far West.

CAMP BAKER, July 12, 1877.

EDITOR SENTINEL:—

I am impelled to write you from seeing an article copied from the N. Y. Herald in one of the Helena, Montana, papers.

The Herald correspondent paints the almost worthless valley of the Yellowstone in such glowing colors, and with such a disregard of truth that is, to say the least, the very least shameful in the extreme.

If he does not write in the interest of speculation, I am at a loss to understand, why he should so misrepresent.

He begins by saying that the valley of the Yellowstone for the first 200 miles has an average width of five miles, then suddenly widens to ten miles, that at Clark's Fork Bottom it spreads out to the "enormous width of 20 miles." That on this bottom there is room for "5000 farmers and stockmen." The fact of the matter is that of real bottom land, such as can be farmed by the help of irrigation, in no place on the Yellowstone is the valley five miles wide. Below Sweet Grass creek which enters the Yellowstone 500 miles from its mouth, not a solitary living stream flows from the north into the Yellowstone, and in all that long distance of 500 miles the ground can only be cultivated by irrigation, and can only be irrigated by raising water from the bed of the Yellowstone, over banks not less than ten feet high.

One thousand farmers, or even 500, if settled on Clark's Fork Bottom and dependent on the ground for subsistence would most assuredly starve.

He also states, that there are rich silver mines at the head of Clark's Fork River and that they have not been worked;—on account of the Indians having been quieted the miners are commencing work. This is another misstatement. There are silver mines there true enough, but, the almost inaccessible nature of the country has kept people out. The enormous expense of getting to and from the lands, through the gloomy and almost impassable mountain gorges will not warrant the experiment of working the mines yet There are no Indians there, nor has there been.

He then discribes the Big Horn, Tongue, Powder, Little Big Horn Rivers and Rosebud creek, landing them to the skies as farming regions, giving the Big Horn valley the place of honor as the future paradise of farmers. The valley he states, at the mouth of the Little Big Horn, is 18 miles wide, abounds in wild fruits and berries, and that, at no distant day this valley alone will furnish homes for 20,000 farmers and stockmen. Now the truth of the matter is, that the whole of Montana, vast as it is, will not support a farming population of 20,000 people, without irrigation. On none of the ground bordering the rivers above mentioned to which this untruthful Herald correspondent so freely and recklessly invites farmers, can crops be grown without raising the necessary water from the beds of the streams Until the vicinity of the mountains is reached, even then the ground must be artificially watered from the mountain brooks. Naturally Montana is fit for nothing but stock growing and mining, and away from the mountains and rivers it is not fit for that.

In the immense tracts of treeless, streamless lands, no living thing can exist in winter. Stretch after stretch of dreary desolation until the mind is lost in surmise as to where the vast sheet of frozen glistening untrodden sheet of snow comes to an end

There is a whole volume of meaning in the single fact that in 1866 67 this territory contained 40,000 and 60,000 inhabitants. To day its entire population will not exceed 15,000 people. Had this been a paradise for farmers or anything like it, would not a greater proportion of the disappointed miners have remained, as was the case with California. To such of your readers as contemplate a move to this country as farmers, I would recommend the perusal of Gen'l. Hazen's plausplet "Our Barren Sands" published by Robert Clark and Co. Cincinatti Ohio. The piece cannot be more than 25cts. The berries and other wild fruit found in this country are almost tasteless. The following extracts from Genl. Hazen's pamphlet is truth itself.

* * * * * * *

To all this Prof. Winchell the chief savant of the expedition—(Custers Black Hillis expedition)—has already spoken slinging that his conscience will not permit him to keep silent. He says that the country is not fruitful and there is no evidence of rich mines. Col. Grant also says "all the good land in the Black Hills will not make twelve good farms."

* * * * * * *

"This country has only one third the rainfall that on an average, falls upon the productive portions of the United States. * * * * *

Within that vast area of barren lands, nature refuses to assist man in the cultivation of the ground. Year after year with wonderful patience, industry and endurance, the emigrant has struggled, and as one winter has followed another cries of distress have gone forth to their brethern of the East and the West: "Give us food, give us clothing, or we shall die."

Their petition will not be made in vain, but it is time that one and all clearly understood that animal and vegetable life cannot be sustained on these barren lands. Hereafter, let emigration to these places known not to be arrable be emphatically discouraged.

The following lines written by a disgusted officer of last summer's expedition fits the country like an old boot.

Oh Yellowstone, my Yellowstone,
The time has come when we must part;
And candor frankly bids me own,
How low regrets oppress my heart.

Through dreary hills of sterile clay,
Long may thy tawny waters roll;
But ever distant be the day,
When sight of thee shall vex my soul.

To roving, wolf and wandering Sioux,
Thy desolation I consign;
And every curse that Cromwell knew,
Forever more be theirs and thine.

Damned be thy sage and cactus plains,
And doubly damned thy ghastly hills;
Where nameless horror lives and reigns,
Fruitful of nought but nameless ills.

May every power that seals my fate,
Keep us asunder, thee and me;
And baneful lines of cordial hate,
I'll daily dedicate to thee.

A great many of the miners that left Western Montana to go to the Black Hills, have returned satisfied to work here at $3.00 to $5.00 per day during the mining months, and spend in winter what they make in summer.

It is the opinion of those who profess to be judges that Montana's population is growing smaller every year. Eventually the population will consist of stockmen, quartz miners, the placer miners being exhausted, and in favorable localities, which are by no means numerous: farmers.

There is plenty more to be said on this subject, but I fear that already my letter is too long.

If you desire any information on any matter connected with this region, I will furnish it if possible.

"In this region there are many years of famine and none of plenty, so that provision for the future cannot be made." * * * * *

The Indian troubles in Idaho are assuming a very grand character. The Sioux to Eastward of us, the Nez Perces, Coeur de Alenes, Yakimas, Umatillas, and Warm Spring Indians to the west. The Flat Heads, Black Feet, Piegans, Bloods, Crows, Gros Ventres, and Assiniboines in our midst, make the settlers and stockmen feel rather uneasy.

Last year the grasshoppers ate the farmers crops, this year it may be a worse visitor.

To day intelligence was received here, that a number of stockmen were run in only thirty miles from this Post, and we may be in the thick of it long before this reaches you. The cattle and sheep were in this valley, and o., the Musselshell River, are not by any means safe, especially those on the Musseshell who are from seventy five to 200 miles outside the lines of safety. The Sioux, and other tribes above mentioned, can put about 25,000, fighting men into the field. In the event of a general outbreak I suppose that our Uncle will send from 500 to 1500 men, who will hammer away until they are all killed, then another lot will be sent to be served the same way, at least this has always been the course pursued with our red brethren. Instead of adopting the views of those who know what will be required, the bloodthirsty politician must be consulted. The result being that we are always outnumbered by the savages.

Don't the Chippewas want to come out and take a hand? Ask George!

W. CLIFFORD.

Latest reports from Deadwood, Dakota Territory, state that the Indians have suddenly become both plenty and hostile in the Black Hills country. Upwards of twenty rauchmen and others had already been killed, and much excitement prevailed. The few troops at hand were promptly reinforced by citizen volunteers, and sent out to punish the redskins.

The Chicago Tribune says: "In one of the Chicago mobs of the first few days, there was a conspicuous figure carrying a banner on which was inscribed, Bread! Bread! Bread!" The fellow that carried that banner was a professional thief, well known to the police, and had been familiar with the interior of several penitentiries. He was toting this epigramatic transparency for the purpose of gathering a crowd upon which his fellow thieves and pickpockets could operate. While holding aloft a luminous appeal for 'Bread! Bread!' he was looking forward to the tenderloins, frogs' legs and champagne he proposed to enjoy on the proceeds of the night's plunder. This is the sort of a fellow who believes the 'world owes him a living.'"

Gen. Grant's retirence pleases the English. It reminds them of the Duke of Wellington's ways. The Duke, when questioned about Waterloo, never ventured farther than saying, "It was a big fight."

A Sterling Vegetable Remedy
Which Eradicates
DISEASES OF THE THROAT AND LUNGS, DYSPEPSIA, GRAVEL, PILES, URINARY TROUBLES, NERVOUS DEBILITY, PALPITATION OF THE HEART, TORPIDITY OF THE LIVER, CONSTIPATION, SCROFULOUS AFFECTIONS, AND FEMALE COMPLAINTS.

For nearly a quarter of a century thisterling preparation has been effecting cures of the various diseases to which it is adapted, and thousands of persons, of perfect reliability, in all classes of society have borne evidence to its wondrous remedial efficacy.

As a remedy for diseases of the Throat and Lungs it has achieved a popularity rivalled by that of few proprietary remedies. Experience has shown that for those who are troubled with weakness of the Lungs it is the best possible protective against Consumption, and it may be relied on with certainty to eradicate Bronchitis, Asthma, Croup, Diptheria, and Soreness of the Chest.

Coughs of the most obstinate kind are speedily overcome by it, and since a simple cough is very prone to develop into serious Inflammation of the Lungs, the early use of Dr. WISHART'S PINE TREE TAR CORDIAL is earnestly recommended, as it invariably prevents the further progress of the disease.

Dyspepsia, Loss of Appetite, Torpidity of the Liver and of the Kidneys are promptly overcome by this superb vegetable corrective, which not only regulates but strengthens the organs of digestion, as well as those of the urinary and biliary secretions. It imparts unwonted relish for the food, and, by promoting digestion and assimilation, enriches the blood, which is the natural motor of vital energy and nutriment to the system.

Dr. L. O. C. Wishart's Pine Tree Tar Cordial thoroughly regulates the Bowels, removes Blind and Bleeding Piles, banishes from the circulation dropsical and all other impurities, and effectually counteracts a tendency to Gravel. It also entirely obviates the weaknesses incident to females.

Dr. L. O. C. Wishart's Pine Tree Tar Cordial is no mere placebo. It is a standard medicine, and has been repeatedly recognized as such by the press and members of the medical profession, who emphatically endorse the popular verdict long since rendered in its favor.

Sold by Druggists everywhere.

ALMOST BURIED ALIVE.

Several in the reception parlor of a boarding-house in Clinton place, a few nights since, Francois Z. Babrien related to a Mercury reporter his thrilling escape from the bowels of the grave. On the Tuesday of the third week of January, of the current year, at Elsburg, Clinton County, in this State, he was buried alive. His escape was as extraordinary as it was providential.

Mr F. Z. Babrien is about thirty-five years old, and slightly above the medium size. He is of French-Canadian extraction, was educated here in Montreal, and for several years has resided at and practiced his profession in Bangor, Province of Quebec. Before the melancholy misfortune is to be mentioned overtook him, he was a robust man of fine physique. Now, he is a pallid, cadaverous personage, whose every motion does not exceed 10 pounds. He is accompanied in his only child—a boy of six summers.

"I would much rather escape the notice of publicity," quoth Mr. Babrien, "but I feel grateful that hitherto the circumstances of my lamentable casket-ment have remained all secret to the world, but I deem my that result to be entirely due to the cessation of that portion of Cupid's dominion in the winter quarter just passed, and in utter darkness. I had no power to stir, and yet I tried to loosen a sheet, or something in which I was apparently enveloped. My hand would not reach my nose when I attempted to do so, by reason of my elbow touching the bottom and my hand the top of the inclosure around me. It was while making this effort and finding myself almost naked, that was suddenly forced upon me the conviction that I had been buried alive. You will hardly believe it when I declare that my first sensation was that of simple surprise. I was like a child aroused out of a deep sleep, and not sufficiently awake to recognize its attendants. When the real truth flashed upon me in all its fearful energy, I never can forget nor describe the unutterable thrill of horror that flashed through me. It was as if a bullet had perforated my heart and all its blood-vessels had been drained through the orifices. I lay motionless for a time stunned petrified with terror. A clammy sweat oozed from every pore of my body. The agony of one million years seemed to be concentrated in one paroxysm. Gradually I seemed to sink into the utter abysm of a calm and resolute despair. I began to think of death coolly and to calculate how long I might survive before famine closed the hour of my existence. This calm state of mind did not last long. Remorse soon began to whisper to me that if I had been buried and the earth had been closed around my coffin, I should not be able to smile, which I could now do with comparative ease. The freedom of respiration conveyed the idea that, after all, I was not yet carried forth for interment; for that I was about to be borne to the grave and that there I should be sufficient. Inevitably. The conviction that my funeral had not yet taken place aggravated my dreadful anxiety to hear myself bored from without. I called aloud and shrieked for aides and aid at the top of my lungs and my voice was hoarse and exhausted. The effort was in vain. A deathly stillness and utter darkness prevailed. I was now steeped in fearful agony. I shrieked with horror. I plunged my nails into my thighs and lacerated them. The coffin was soaked with my blood. I tore the woolen sides with my teeth like a mad dog, swearing audibly like a mad dog, swearing audibly like a mad dog, swearing audibly

ANOTHER FIASCO.—The SENTINEL announced last week that arrangements had been made with Carkin, Stickney & Crain, whereby the upper river was to be dredged. The dredge moved into the channel as we went to press with the intention of doing the work, but a telegram from the Engineer ordered him at once to Cheboygan to commence work and our job had to be abandoned.

Any one wanting either bees wax or barn door hangings go to Carpenter & Bartholomew's.

THE CHURCH.—The new M. E. Church edifice in this place can now be said to be completed and ready for dedication and occupancy—at least nothing remains to be done but seating, which project the building committee now have under consideration, and will without doubt accomplish soon. It has not been definitely determined whether the building will remain unoccupied until dedication, or temporary seats put in for present use; most likely the former. It is an important fact that this edifice has been erected upon the "pay as you go" plan, and has been completed without leaving upon the society a burdensome debt. We assert upon authority, and without fear of contradiction, that the fact is without parallel in Methodist church building in this state. It stands a monument of the public spirit as well as the civilization of our community. The pastor in charge deserves much praise for the energy he has evinced.

A new and choice stock dry goods just received at Carpenter & Bartholomew's.

CHARLEVOIX AS A RESORT.—Year after year Charlevoix is growing in popularity as a summer resort. During the present warm season the Fountain City House has been full to overflowing, and private boarding houses have been in demand. Our many great attractions must continue to increase the travel here during the warm season, and another summer hotel will have to be built to meet the increasing demand for accommodation. In fact we think two hotels could be filled to overflowing during the summer months. It is fast becoming realized that Charlevoix surpasses all other points in Northern Michigan as a resort for those who desire rest from labor, health or pleasure. We have a great variety of attractions, combining steamboat riding or sailing fifteen miles to the interior, beautiful scenery, and proximity of those famous trout streams the Jordan and Boyne.

MICHIGAN AHEAD.—The Lansing Republican says that J. E. Warner, the experienced traveler and showman, who resider in Lansing, returned to his home a few days ago. He has this season made a thorough tour of California, and saw much to repel immigrants, but little or nothing to draw them from Michigan. The wheat crop of this year is ruined by drouth, and the cattle and sheep are perishing by thousands. Men are offering to give away their stocks and herds if any one will keep them alive, and where last year over 300 ship loads of wheat were exported, this year there will not be enough raised for home consumption. The bottom has fallen out of mining stocks, and there is no spot on earth at present where men of small means would find it so difficult to live as on the Pacific slope, having traveled through almost every state in the union, Mr. Warner is qualified to express an opinion on the advantages of different localities; and he unhesitatingly declares that Michigan, with her natural excellence of soil and variety of production, and the welcome she offers to worthy settlers, and her enterprise and love of education, entrenched in the very frame work of her political and social organization, stands in the very front rank of the American union.

WE have again disheartening news from the campaign against the Nez Perces Indians. Gen. Gibbon has been defeated by them in a hotly contested fight on the Big Hole river in Montana. This locality must not be confounded with that of the Big Horn river in the same territory, near which Gen. Custer and his gallant followers met their fate. It is some two hundred miles or more west of the latter, some hundred miles east of the locality of the first Nez Perces outbreak, and across the main ridge of the mountains from that point. The scene of the last battle is in the most mountainous region of Montana, some eight miles southward of Helena, and some sixty northwest of Bannock. It seems from the meager news which has thus far been received that Gen. Gibbon attacked the Indians in a strongly fortified position, and, after winning some unimportant advantages, was driven back with a heavy loss. Two officers and fifty men were killed, and Gen. Gibbon himself and a number of officers wounded. The company of Capt. Clifford, well known to our readers, was evidently in the fight, as Lieut. Coolidge of that Company is reported among the wounded.

A Paper City

Written for the Sentinel.

The above is the name of a new novel which has been doled out in weekly installments, a la mode, in the New York Independent, by D. R. Locke, widely known by the nom de plume, Rev. Petroleum V. Nasby. As the name suggests, the scene revolves about one of those points in the great west, where a parcel of wild-cat speculators proposed to develop a mighty city to rival Chicago in magnitude, and pour uncounted millions into their coffers by the operation. Character painting is freely indulged. Some of the portraits are life like; others are mere caricatures. The plot is, perhaps, well conceived, and in the main successfully executed; but is disappointed in some of impossible events, and justice in all cases is hardly quite observed

New Canton, we are told, was originally the meanest town in Illinois. It was situated on Loggy run, and was supposed to be tributary to the Illinois River by way of Catfish and Eel Creeks. It passed through several transition states before the romance describes began. It had two hostile newspapers, three churches not on very friendly terms with each other, but friendly enough with the world, three doctors, both the others quacks in the opinion of each, Borax and Blister are named, and three lawyers, magnetically repellant, like the rest. It had a branch railroad and a wild premise of four more. It was at such a time that Mr. Charles Burt appeared upon the scene. He was of low extraction and a dentist by profession, but he turns up here as a "speculator with check of brass and tongue hung upon swivel." This man weaves a magnificent web from the loom of his own fancy and seeks a conference with some of the lords of the "one mile town," and succeeds in virtue of his blandishments in organizing a land company, with his own name upon the front as secretary and treasurer. A magnificent city is laid out upon paper, and the maps displayed with much cunning upon the walls of their office. The only capitalist in the company was a banker by the name of Gardiner. Burt was shrewd enough to have him made president. It was from his coffers that the money came to make the display. This Gardiner had a son, James, who was a young lawyer, college bred, handsome, brilliant and honest, was the pet of a credulous and doting father; but there were "spots upon the sun," for "Jim" was as notorious as ever Rip Van Winkle and of decidedly Bacchanalian habits. Such was the attorney for the land company. He was early in his office, being mostly employed hunting and fishing or at the saloon, when not in company with Mary Lewis, who was the idol of his heart, Mary had a pretty face, a moderate intellect was just a little disposed to flirt, but became very deeply attracted to Jim and promised to marry him. Her mother was a vain, mercenary woman, at first, warmly in favor of the match; but after she saw the probable downfall of the senior Gardiner, she repudiated the whole affair, without a twinge. It seems that Lewis' fortune was tottering though not generally known, and the unfeeling mother, virtually, compelled Mary to wed a miserable sexagenarian by the name of Tom Paddleford. This out-winged tallow had not a single redeeming trait, but he was thought to be rich, and this was the sine qua non. The fact was Tom's finances were rotten, and he was in quest of Lewis supposed pile. The wedding was a brilliant affair, and Mr Locke describes it like the professional reporter is capable of doing. Jim Gardiner maddened by the loss of his mate, plunged deeper than ever into his excesses, till overtaken by a new resolution, he at once, quit his "gay companions o'er the bowl" and though he did not take to real piety, he took hold of his business in good earnest. In course of time he found a new "phantom of delight" in the person of Beatrice Butterfield, who was the daughter of a small farmer a little out of the town who was an admirable model of shiftlessness, but with a thriving wife. The portrait of "old Butterfield" though it is but a figure in the back ground is a fine exemplification. Emeline I regard as a somewhat impossible character. Mr. Locke has hardly done justice by her. She arose to the general management of Burts household. She was the personification of perfection as housekeeper. She was handsome, graceful, attained to considerable literary culture, in short, was the creature of many accomplishments. But for all that, she was "old Butterfield's daughter," and as the lowest aristocracies in New Canton felt that they had a right to throw a sneer and an insult at her heels, ad libitum. Jim and Emeline became intimate, companions and ardent lovers. The gossips predicted I cannot chronicle the many scenes, well-drawn.

Let it suffice to say, that when Jim learned how the miserable pukes of the town felt towards his new jewel, he Japanese Night Shops.

The great Japanese night shops lined by gay shops, and brilliancy illumined by gas lamps, would in itself be sufficiently attractive, but at this season of the year it is rendered much more so by the presence of "night shops," which extend almost a continuous line from Kodoshi to Shiba Ichi. These shops are kept by very poor dealers, who come out between eight and nine o'clock in the evening and stay till eleven or even later. Their method of doing business is very simple. Each merchant spreads his meager display of goods on a mat in the gutter, on one corner of which he sits, keeping a sharp lookout for the depredations who crowd about his expectant property. The wares on sale are of the cheapest description, of course, but are attractively arranged, and make a pretty appearance, often in the weird flickering rays of the torch lamp of fallow saturated paper. Generally secondhand, but sometimes new, they consist of a motley all kinds of goods to common request, such as domestic utensils, books, sandals, gutta, "chopped hair," false "back hair," combs of every conceivable and inconceivable shape and purpose. Some stocks are, collectively, of considerable value, but in many cases a five-dollar note would buy out the entire establishment. But to most of these dealers the small amount of ready cash is undreamed of wealth, and few of the transactions amount to a higher sum than a few cents. Nothing value can suffice as a medium of exchange.

Most of these tradesmen have other occupations during the daytime, but about the streets, with boxes on their backs, picking up trifles at low prices when they can find a purchaser, and hawking their capital. Some, again, are sent out by established houses to work off cheap and damaged goods. When not engaged in business they may be found in very dirty houses called by the Japanese aradana, or back-shops, in lower rooms and miserable localities where they make a shift to live. But despite their dingy poverty they seem to share the happy disposition of their nation, and a passer-by who stops in examine their wares will find them polite, pleasant and eager. Always especially it will be worth his while to examine the wares, for, now and then, really pretty articles may be picked up at very low prices. And the purchaser, sharp as he usually is, in bargain, may rest assured that he has at any rate got some fun and sly laugh at his own unaccustomed profits. —Tokio Times

How the Strike Was Inaugurated.

The Trainmen's Union, which inaugurated the present strike, was organized between engineers on the Ohio & Mississippi when the Pennsylvania Company and the Pennsylvania Railroad Company reduced the wages of their men. The cut in wages, to take effect on June 1. Mr. A. R. Ammon, then employed on the Fort Wayne Road, and living at Washington, was in the service, and at once proceeded to the organization of the Union. Three years ago, when the engineers struck, the firemen took their positions at the throttle, and there was no interruption to business. At this time the engineers struck all along the line and the trains, and flagmen, brakemen, conductors and firemen took the oath, which the members refuse to disclose, and Ammon was the first to sign the roll and issue the oath, and following came the names of the Fort Wayne men. This was all the organization there was about it. A trip was made over the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad by the leaders, and finally the "secret" of the line broke the oath. About this time the Managers of the Consolidated Division got wind of the situation, and discharged all the men who joined the union. The work of organization meantime went on, and a Board was ordered for June 27, the going out of the Fort Wayne men to be the signal for a general strike on the trunk lines. The men on the Fort Wayne line were assembled, and the strike did not take place. Mr. Ammon predicted that a general strike would follow the action of the Fort Wayne Road, and the news by telegraph from all parts of the country seems to justify his statement. The union was a strong one, considering that it was a little over a month old. The engineers, although not members of the union, are nevertheless in sympathy with the strikers, and it does not require much intimidation to cause them to desert their engines. This is the statement made by the leading strikers in the union.—Pittsburgh Chronicle.

THE FAIRIES' TABLE-CLOTH.

Here is the fairies' table-cloth
Dew'd with bluebell bells and cockle-pearls;
Here is the cloth they left behind
After their feast was done at midnight.

Never such napery met our eyes;
Never such cobweb lawn! See fringe!
Dotted with dots design'd to cost, alas!
Bordered with seed-pearl all around.

Sprigs of shamrock lily-wise;
Specks of gold from the tulip's heart;
Silver spot mixed unlike rare—
Napkin-fringed by the maiden's hair.

Wine from the spice-wood's vintage, poured
Out of the sedge's Venice glass;
Bread from the cedar-leaf wafer shred;
Dates from the buds of waxen fruit;

Meats from the laurels' sweets and sours
Fashioned alone for fairy lips.
Out of the leaves of pre-said flowers,
Out of the petals of pre-said bowers,
Out of the sepal's cup and saucer—

Fruits from the winter green, sloe, grape;
Barberries tied with ruby gloves;
Hollyberries, coral of price;
Forest in leaves of fine repose.

Sultry toad stools ranged in shades,
Meant not to be seen of mortal eye;
Fairies and fays their revels keep
Up in the green grass wood.

Ah, what a supper it must have been!
Beautiful seeded, rare, fare—
Ah, if I only had been there!

THE BIG-HEADED MEDICINE MAN.

The North American Indians, especially the Algonquin tribes, are governed entirely superstitions in regard to deformed persons, deeming them divine in some manner, or in league with the Great Spirit. Many of the "medicine men"—manitouisors"—among those tribes were hunchbacked, club-footed, hare-lipped or something of the kind. Red Jacket, a famous Seneca Chief, had a brother who was considered a prophet because he was deformed. Ekkatawa, twin brother of Tecumseh, and the most renowned of all Shawanese medicine men, did not belong to the regular priestly family of the tribe, but assumed his office "because the Great Spirit gave him all his brains on one foot and six fingers on each hand."

Enos Owen was a deformity belonging to a family of pioneer whites. His father and brothers were stalwart and athletic, engaging in all the struggles of their times, but Enos was a dwarf. He rest to say of himself that he was all "understanding," for at the age of thirty his head and feet were as large as other men's, while his body was like a child of twelve. He had the mind necessary to enslow a first-class man, but his shrunken frame made him dependent and incapable.

In the year 1812, during a fight attack by the Indians, Enos found himself fenced on all of bed in the darkness, and instead of having his big head tomahawked and scalped, he was held in a gang of captive women and children and marched off into the northwest wilderness. A summer or two passed, and he knew by the movements of the warriors that they were seeking a camp, and soon they disappeared in a narrow ravine thickly grown with luxuriant deciduous trees, among which stood a few lofty pines. Here they built their wigwams and planted their corn, and here they remained for the winter. This was the usual encampment of the Indians during the war, and it was no great display of wisdom for Enos to guess out their intentions.

When the warriors began their hunting place until darkness sheltered him, he stole down to the river's edge and saw their canoes making for the Canada landings not twenty rods away. But the camp was very quiet as compared with former nights, another proof of proximity to the whites.

Now if he had strength enough left in him the settlement his object would be accomplished.

Quickly he crept away from the vicinity of the red-skins, and following the water pushed on as best he could toward those whom he sought to warn and save. But ah, what a night march was that for Enos! His moccasins were worn to strings, his leg feet were blistered and swollen, and his big head ached with the effects of weariness and hunger. He was almost ready to cry out in his pain and despair, but the fear of being overheard by the savages kept him from doing so.

The next day he described that any case it was all that time there has been no reduction until last year, when the sum of $442,877 was paid off.

The Dutch Farmer in Africa.

The Dutch farmer or Boer of the interior of the Cape Colony may be described in a few words. In every community there are bad exceptions; and the exception is fast making a bad one at a distance. the South African Boer has till lately been regarded in England as little better than a savage. We must learn to know his fairer side. The type is unchanging. As he was in 1806 is the Colony, so he is in 1876 in the Republics of the interior. He is uncultivated. He is unprogressive, but he possesses qualities which even here will be regarded as not without value. He is domestic, but not gregarious. When he settles he procures from 9,000 to 20,000 acres of undulating grass plain. He takes possession in his wagon with his wife and children, his family furniture, an family Bible, which is all his literature, and his sheep and cattle. He selects a spring of water as a site, for his house; he settles, perhaps, from his nearest neighbor. His house consists of a central hall, with a kitchen behind it, and three, four, or five bed-rooms opening out of it, all on the same floor. He builds kraals for his cattle. He fences in a garden which he carefully irrigates. And so rapid is the growth in that soil and climate that in four or five years it will be stocked with peaches, lemons, citrons, peaches, apricots, figs, apples, pears and grape-vines. In five years fifty or a hundred acres, which he plows and sows with wheat or Indian corn. His herds and flocks multiply with little effort. If he is unskilled he seeks a few ostriches, whose feathers he sells at high profits. Finally, his children are numerous and they marry young. The old man gives to each daughter a farm, and settles his sons around him. The whole family is a large one. Every man is a gun, and every family a house is built a few gun-shots from the rest. A few years after he founded under the shade of his own vine and fig-tree. His life is free from anxiety. He has good neighbors and plenty of land. His children and grandchildren, when the land is good they remain at his side. For each new

TO A MAGDALEN.

I gaze upon that face, but while
It seems so bright and fair,
I ask me, if that sunny smile
Is wont to linger there?
I ask me if that bosom's heave
Hides not a heart that's doomed to grieve
And wither in despair?
I ask if joy and peace can be
With beings desolate like thee?

I know I see not, thou fallen flower,
When virtue mark'd thy growth;
I know thee not, 'till treacherous ways
Had dimm'd the sunshine of thy days,
The freshness of thy youth;
And then I cast thee in thy shame,—
Without a friend—without a name,—

An outcast from thy happy home,
A blighted joyless thing,
Thy journey, onward to the tomb,
A rayless wandering;
Uncheer'd by hope, thy bosom heaves,
Yet, like the rose's scattered leaves,
Some sweets still 'round thee cling,
And dimly thro' thy ruins shine,
Like ivy on the shatter'd pine.

Thou'rt beauty still upon thy brow,
And kindness in thy heart;
That smile is with thee, even now,
All hopeless as thou art;
But sorrow's wave too soon will chase
The light of beauty from thy face,
And thou with them depart;
As bends the lily to the blast,
Unwept, unloved, thou'll sink at last.

God help thee on that awful day!
For none will watch thy bed
None sight to see thee pass away,
Nor grieve for thee when dead;
None seek the silent, lonely spot
Where all forsaken and forgot,
Declines thy lowly head.
The turf, alas, will soon be green
And few will know that though hast been.

OUR NEW YORK LETTER.

New York, Aug. 18, 1877.

I shall not be able to write you any letter this week, and as such an irregularity demands an explanation I will make a clean breast of it and apologize briefly for my short coming. The fact is I dont know what has been going on here, for during most of the time since my last, I have been by, in and under "the soft sea waves" whose glorious roar has filled my ears to the utter exclusion of the city's clatter. I had about made up my mind to stay in the traces through this summer, in a staid and business like manner, but the fates were against me. The weather was warm here and I knew it. "Our set" wrote up from the seashore of braeing days and refreshing nights such as make a man a terror at the boarding house table, and white-toped breakers that wash headache and the "hyps" out of body and mind. This put a strain on my fortitude which the urgent proposition of a friend, that we should "shake the shop" and seek this inviting spot finally broke down and I surrendered at discretion. Once out of the path of duty, our downward course was fearfully rapid; so much so that by the time we were fairly seated in the cars and whirling along the length of Long Island, I really do not believe that the news that New York was burned up or had been suddenly swallowed up by an earthquake would have seriously disturbed our serenity, or so much as suggested an interference with our plans.

I don't propose to tell where we went, any further than that it was on the outer shore of the island, where the long rollers, in endless procession, break slowly and heavily, as though wearied with their unbroken journey across the Atlantic, and where miles of hard, white beach offer attractions to wearied humanity, to which, as it seems to me, the combined ailinements of inland resorts should form no serious competition. Neither do I intend to give you a record of our stay there, excepting as far as it may seem proper to amplify this apology, and show you the sort of things which prevented me from doing my duty by your readers this week. Without particularizing them, I think it proper to state that the surf occupied most of our attention, and that it was well worthy of it. The scene on the beach every morning from ten to twelve was a jolly one. Some hundred or two of other New Yorkers than ourselves had found out the quiet little place, and at about the hour first above-named most of them would come trooping down from the town, which lies nearly two miles from the ocean, pressing into the transportation service every sort of vehicle which it has entered into the heart of man to construct—buggies, carriages, carts, spring wagons, farm wagons and what not, in rattling procession each a bouquet of humanity, with men for the green portions, and charming girls for the roses, lilies, fuchsias, heliotropes and other sweet blossoms of Gotham. Come to look over my hetrical similie here, I find it somehow doesn't read very flatteringly to my own sex, but as I haven't time to stop and fix it now I will let it go merely requesting your fair readers to give me proper credit for the comparison. Well as I was saying, a fun-loving crowd soon accumulates on the sand, and at once proceeds to the various business of the day. The older folks spread their shawls and their sun umbrellas, the children get out their miniature pails and shovels and with their little skirts gathered into a ridiculous similarity to a chignon behind them, rush shoeless and stockingless for the wet sand, and then and there perform such complicated feats of engineering in the way of mounds, trenches and fortifications as would greatly astonish a West Pointer. The residue and larger part of the company make for the line of pine bathing shanties in the background and are lost to view. Their absence is brief, but, shades of our ancestors! what a transformation does it suffice to produce, especially among the fair creatures! Nary an artificial charm now. Nary a flounce, or furbelow, or bit of lace, or neat boot, or pretty hat to intensify the attractions that exist or supply the place of those that nature has withheld. Only a flapping bag of blue flannel, topped with an oil silk bag for the hair—unless, indeed the greater part of the latter is left in the bathing-house—heck the form which so lately bewitched the observer. But there is one advantage All look about alike and nobody cares for looks anyway; especially, when, after the necessary amount of trying the water with many retreats and delicious little screams, all hands are fairly in old Neptune's embrace, and have all they want to do to attend to his caresses.

But right here I desire to prevent a possible misapprehension. You may perhaps infer from my remarks upon the appearance of the young ladies when robed for the sea, that I myself looked real pretty in my bathing clothes. But I did not. I make this statement with some confidence because my conclusion in the matter is not based on my own unsupported opinion. I got a good deal of volunteer testimony on the subject from my friends, and it was all so direct and uniform in affirming my resemblance to a scarecrow in the rain, that I see no ground to doubt its correctness. But however that may be, the Atlantic did not appear to mind my costume, but as soon as I got within its reach, picked me up, turned me over, thumped me down on the sand and roared its "How are you?" with a hearty but somewhat misplaced cordiality similar to that of your boisterous friend, (you know him, of course; everybody has one) who meets you on the street after a fortnight's absence, knocks the breath out of you with a blow on the back, wrings your arm out of joint, and talks to you in a tone that would reach you if you were a mile off—all to prove to you the devoted character of his friendship.

One gets his sea legs on though after a few tumbles, and it soon got to be an exhilarating pleasure to stand in five feet of water grasping the life-line, and see one great green wall after another roll toward us, mounting higher and higher, and growing thinner and thinner as it approached, till it curled over our devoted heads and rushed seething up the sand.

And then the effect of the thing! After half an hour of such buffeting the waves, you feel like a new creature. Health, vigor, appetite—every thing that the physical system wants seems to flow in at every pore. Were I to turn physician to-day, I am afraid my prescriptions would seem rather monotonous, for I would pack every patient off to the sea-shore and let the great pool of health do all the healing.

The point on the beach at which our surf bathing was done chanced to be very near one of the life saving stations of the U. S. Coast Service, and I had an opportunity of learning something of the workings of this important system. These stations are placed along this portion of the cost at intervals of about ten miles. During the winter months, from the first of November till the middle of April each is manned by a picked crew who patrol the beach every night and hold every thing in readiness to succor distressed vessels. Our host forms one of the winter crew, and through his kindness I procured access to station and much more interesting information than I can reproduce here. The station itself is a small unpretending frame structure lying among the "dunes" or sand piles, which the storm of centuries have raised, and contains within a space of 40x15 feet, the kitchen and cot-beds of the crew of seven, two large life-boats mounted on wheels ready to run out at a moment's notice, the mortar from which twenty-four-pound balls carrying life-lines are fired, rockets for signals, appliances for restoring the benumbed seamen who may be rescued from the waves, and everything else which ingenuity and humanity can suggest for heightening the efficiency of the service. Curiously enough the most serious disaster known to that coast occured directly off this station last winter, on the 29th of December the fine iron vessel, the Circassian broke up, drowning twenty-eight men. This however was no fault of the station, but of the careless wreckers who alone lost their lives by their own recklessness.

But I am afraid my apology is getting rather long, and that you will wish that instead of trying to explain why I can't give you any letter this week, I would just let it go and say nothing about it. So I won't say anything about our experience in blue-fishing, or about that big clambake we had up on the Shinnecock Indian reservation, or any of our numerous other exploits; but, promising strict attention to business in future, will subscribe myself, penitent ly. RADIX.

As a remedy for diseases of the Throat and Lungs it has achieved a popularity rivalled by that of few proprietary remedies. Experience has shown that for those who are troubled with weakness of the Lungs it is the best possible protective against Consumption, and it may be relied on with certainty to eradicate Bronchitis, Asthma, Croup, Diptheria, and Soreness of the Chest.

Coughs of the most obstinate kind are speedily overcome by it, and since a simple cough is very prone to develop into serious Inflammation of the Lungs, the early use of Dr. WISHART'S PINE TREE TAR CORDIAL is earnestly recommended, as it invariably prevents the further progress of the disease.

Dyspepsia, Loss of Appetite, Torpidity of the Liver and of the Kidneys are promptly overcome by this superb vegetable corrective, which not only regulates but strengthens the organs of digestion, as well as those of the urinery and biliary secretions. It imparts unwonted relish for the food, and, by promoting digestion and assimilation, enriches the blood, which is the natural motor of vital energy and nutriment to the system.

Dr. L. O. C. Wishart's Pine Tree Tar Cordial thoroughly regulates the Bowels, removes Blind and Bleeding Piles, banishes from the circulation dropsical and all other impurities, and effectually counteracts a tendency to Gravel. It also entirely obviates the weaknesses incident to females.

Dr. L. O. C. Wishart's Pine Tree Tar Cordial is no mere placebo. It is a standard medicine, and has been repeatedly recognized as such by the press and members of the medical profession, who emphatically endorse the popular verdict long since rendered in its favor.

Seventeen Families of a Canadian Town Burned to Death.

SIMCOE, ONT., ——

At 10:45 on Saturday evening fire was discovered in the Poor House on the Industrial Farm of the County of Norfolk, and about one mile from the town. The building was very old, dry and built of wood. The fire originated in the centre of the building down stairs, and spread so rapidly that before any alarm could be given both staircases were in ruins there being no outside means of egress. The inmates were sleeping both on the ground floor and the first floor above, the men on the one side and the women on the other. Very few people were at the scene of conflagration, owing to the distance at which the Poor House was situated from the town. The fire alarm was not sounded and no fire engines or fire men were passed.

Meanwhile the flames spread rapidly, and, notwithstanding the extreme excitement and complete presence of mind of an old, blind man, an inmate of the building, who went through room after room and awoke the men and boys and women, and aided in the hasty dressing, he inmates lost all control of themselves and were as helpless as infants. The blind man fearlessly led most of the weak and aged, and worked until the flames and smoke compelled him to seek safety in flight. Notwithstanding all the efforts of the males perished in the flames. Meantime, some one in the crowd formed an entrance from the outside to the female department, and succeeded in awakening all the inmates. They were, if possible, more excited than the men, and, although many jumped out of the windows at a distance of twelve feet, others could not be induced to leave. Owing to the rapidity with which the flames spread, the time was very short, not exceeding from the first twenty five minutes, before the greater part of the building was in flames.

Meanwhile the grounds surrounding the building were in a state of great confusion. Men and women were running like mad people, some half-dressed and some with nothing on but a night-shirt, crying and uttering the most pitiful shrieks. During this time the crowd were witnessing a sad and heart-rending scene. Men and women could be seen through the open windows seated on their beds and the flames rapidly licking the bed-clothes and their own scanty clothing.

One young girl went down-stairs, and when she found all retreat was cut off in that direction she sank down on the stairs and perished. She was plainly visible through the open door, and many a brave heart sickened and turned from this most horrible spectacle. Another woman threw two of her children out of the window and then jumped herself. Fortunately, some men underneath caught both mother and children.

After a lapse of fifteen or twenty minutes the doors and walls gave way, and left nothing standing but the frame. All the victims could plainly be seen in the ruins lying. This was the most sickening scene that the crowd had to withstand. Soon the frame fell, and in a very short time all was buried in smoke and ashes.

There were seven men, eight women and two boys burned to death, and four men who escaped were badly burned, and one man had his leg broken in jumping from the window. These unfortunates received all possible attention. They were conveyed at once to the County Jail, in the town, and received medical aid. It is feared that four of them will not recover. Those who escaped were well cared for. They were temporarily housed in the Jail and a small house on the premises and attended by the Matron of the Poor House. There were forty inmates, twenty-three women and seventeen men, the remainder being under the age of fifteen.

The Battle of Plevna.

LONDON, Aug. ——

The Daily News correspondent, telegraphing from Bulgarini, fifteen miles from Plevna, gives a detailed account of the fighting of Thursday. The Turkish force was estimated at 50,000. They occupied a series of positions which by naturally strong and artificially fortified in every available spot, forming a horseshoe in front of Plevna, with both flanks resting on the River Vid. The Russian force consisted of the Ninth Army Corps, under Gen. Krudener, the Third, Fourth Rifle Brigade and the Fourth Corps of the Second Division, under Prince Schakesky, with three brigades of cavalry and 160 guns. It was arranged that Gen. Krudener should attack the Turkish center at Grivica and the northern flank of the intrenched position, while Prince Schakesky attacked Radizevo and Gear. Skabeleff held in check the strong Turkish force at Lovea, which was the extremity of the Turkish line. Gen. Krudener began the battle about half-past nine o'clock. After a long bombardment he succeeded in silencing the Turkish cannon at Grivica, but could not expel the infantry from the earthworks. He spent the whole afternoon unavailingly endeavoring to force the northern flank of the Turkish position, assisting after dark without having gained anything material, and having himself suffered considerable loss. Prince Schakesky about noon carried Radizevo, and, planting four batteries on the ridge beyond, bombarded the entire Turkish position which was on an earthwork armed with cannon in front of an intrenched village. After an hour's cannonade he silenced the Turkish guns, and his infantry, after a long and bloody contest, carried the earthwork and the village. The second Turkish position, consisting of a series of intrenched vineyards strongly held, was then attacked and ultimately carried, but with a terrible effort and very severe loss, owing to the heavy Turkish artillery fire. The Russians, moreover, were unable to utilize the captured position. About four o'clock the reserve brigade was brought up and an attack made on the positions immediately covering Plevna. The attack continued till nearly sunset. The Turkish infantry was in great force in a continuous line under the shelter of the trenches. Despite the most stubborn efforts no impression could be made upon that line. Two companies of Russian infantry did work round to the right of the Turkish trenches and entered [illegible] town of Plevna, but it was impossible to hold it. The Russian batteries pushed boldly forward into the position first taken by attempt to keep down the Turkish cannonade which was crashing into the infantry in the open field, but they were compelled soon to evacuate the hazardous spot. At sunset the Turks made a concerted movement forward and recovered their second position. The Russian infantry made a succession of desperate charges, but failed like heroes. The Turks gradually retook everything they had lost. The fighting lasted long after nightfall. With its losses the Russian Razooks took possession of the battle field and slew all the wounded. The Russians held the heights about Radizevo, but the Russian Bazouks worked around to their rear and fell on the wounded collected in the Village of Radizevo. A retreat was compelled in the direction of Butgareni, and the cantinge in loss resulting from this untoward battle are of ominous significance.

Six Lives Lost by Fire in Cincinnati.

A Cincinnati special of the 3d gives the following account of the recent disastrous conflagration in that city, by which six persons met with horrible deaths:

A most disastrous fire, resulting in the death of six persons and severe injuries to several others, and a heavy loss of property, occurred in this city this morning. The victims were most of them girls, persons, three of the number girls, ranging in age from sixteen to twenty years. Two were boys of eighteen and twenty, just verging upon manhood, and one of them, although perhaps both, gave up heartily exclaimed: "I'm very glad to see you here, Gen. Shields, and will cut out every one of the rebels you command before long." As I this was simply Gen Zachary Taylor, one of the brave, kindest and noblest men that ever lived.

GENIO OSUNO.

Previous to the brilliant American victory at Cerro Gordo the enemy's forces, numbering about fifteen thousand men, had carefully surveyed the highest to the commanding position in the adjoining town, and had reported it inaccessible. Rover, looked the whole Mexican Army, but the Americans were confident that it could not be occupied, and the same belief prevailed in the American camp. The night before the assault was a very dark one. Shields was in his tent, when toward midnight a number of soldiers of his command came to the day, and a portion of the girls found gun on the top of the cliff.

"I was astonished. 'Don't you know,' I asked, 'that the engineers say that it can't be climbed?—to say nothing about putting cannon up there.' They insisted, however, that they should be able to try it.

'Try it, then, boys,' I said; 'no harm will be done, even if you fail.' They went to the work, and in a short time they came again with the amazing news that they actually had a six-pounder in position on the summit of that almost perpendicular height.

"'And if you'll consent, sir,' said one of them, 'we'll put a twelve-pounder there, too.'

"'Go ahead,' I replied. 'I'll believe you can do anything after this.' And long before daylight they reported that the twelve pounder was up there beside the six-pounder, ready to open on the Mexicans in the morning. I thought the news too good to be kept, so I went to Gen. Twiggs' tent and roused him up. He took my story, and looked at me as though he did not believe a word of it.

"'Do you mean to tell me 'he exclaimed,' that these fellows of yours have hauled a twelve-pounder and a six-pounder up to the top of that height?'

"'Yes, sir; and what do you think of that?'

"I think there are two pieces of artillery lost to the United States, for they are not men enough in the army to get them down again.'

"But those two pieces did excellent service against the astonished Mexicans that day, and they were got down again safely."

GEN. SANTA ANNA'S DAUGHTER.

Gen. Santa Anna was in command of the Mexicans at Cerro Gordo. He was utterly defeated and compelled to retreat, with heavy losses in prisoners, material and killed and wounded. Shields was dangerously wounded in the fight, and of course he left it at dusk. When he became convalescent it was informed that a lady living opposite the house where he was lying sick and wounded attentive, and had been of much help to his attendants. As soon as he was allowed to walk out he went to thank her; when he learned to his surprise that she was a daughter of Santa Anna. In the course of the conversation that followed he remarked:

"But did you know who it was that you were ministering to all this time?"

"Not at first," she replied; "but I discovered after a time that you were Gen. Shields, who I had heard was killed."

"Then you no doubt know at the first that I was one who had a large share in defeating your father, you would not have spoken to me."

She drew herself up with the air of an old Castilian. "Sir," she said, "had you left your son to die in battle, my father's fair fight—in fair fight—I would have done for you in your extremity just as you have done for me. And she kissed it as well as spoke it.

MAGRUDER AND THE GUERRILLA.

I was during the campaign, about this time, that an incident occurred which the lecturer very humorously described. It was the case greatly abbreviated, John B. Magruder, of subsequent Confederate fame, was then an officer in the regular army, and a captain of artillery, his horse-manship. On day he rode across the square on a superb black animal that he had just bought for a high price, and came to the window by which Shields lay, that the latter might see and admire his purchase. On reaching the steed and the bearing of the rider drew a crowd into the square, and presently there were a thousand or more soldiers, officers and private assembled, all kinds watching and admiring "Jack Magruder" show off. After a time, when Magruder had stopped a moment, one of the Mexicans came up to him, patted and praised the horse, and told the officer that he rode almost as well as an inhabitant of the country.

"Almost!" Magruder cried. "I can ride as well as any Mexican! Show me one who can ride better."

"Any!" said the Mexican, "you claim too much. You ride well, but it is not possible that you can know our horses quite as well as we do."

Magruder insisted, and, growing warm, offered to bet a dozen doubloons that he could ride his horse better than the other could. The Mexican objected; said he did not like to bet and did not like to show off his horsemanship in public, but at last, as Magruder grew more urgent, he reluctantly consented, and the money was put up in the hands of another Mexican. For judges, an American was chosen by Magruder, a Mexican by his adversary, and the two together chose for the third a Frenchman. Then Magruder put his horse through his paces, first walking around the square, then trotting, then galloping, and finally putting the animal to top speed, with a magnificent jump that drew cheers and hand clappings from the crowd. After a few moments the Mexican came forward for trial. With out touching his hands to the animal he vaulted on his back and went through with precisely the same performance as had Magruder, and really proved himself to be the more accomplished horseman of the two. Magruder himself joined in the applause, and admitted frankly that he was fairly beaten. The Mexican smiled and bowed, and said: "Now, if the Senor will wait a moment I will show him a feat of horsemanship the like of which he has never seen."

Magruder assented, and the Mexican rode half way round the square, and then, putting spurs to the horse, disappeared in a cloud of dust.

"What the dickens does that mean?" said the owner of the horse.

"I only saw one man who can ride like that," said a bystander, "and that is Mollno."

"Molino, the guerrilla!" groaned Magruder.

"The same, sir. I don't think you'll ever see your horse again."

He never did, and the Mexican who held the stakes had also disappeared, and money and horse were gone together. Magruder never heard the last of this trick from his brother officers, and while his vexation lasted he was known as "the biggest fool in the American army."

We hear a very pretty incident the other day, which we cannot help relating. A young lady from the South, a widow, was wooed and won by a youthful physician living in California. When the happy consummation was about to take place, the young lady's friends, who were rich, having been very successful at San Francisco. Why, like an honorable and chivalrous young fellow as he is, he tells his young girl wrote the lady her particular of the unhappy turn which has taken place in his fortunes, assuring her that if she had entertained any change in her feelings toward him, she is released from every promise she has made him. He should not be surprised, he said, if she should see a lump of pure gold, which her love has sent her in his prosperity as a token that nothing in the shape of gold can change his feelings toward her. He turned to his manuscript, and went on writing, forwards it to him with the following Bible inscription engraved in the finest manner upon it: "Thine heart I give me not to leave thee, or to return from following after thee; for whither thou goest I will go, and whither thou lodgest will I lodge; thy people will be my people and thy God my God, where thou diest will I die, and there will I be buried; the Lord do so to me, and more also if aught but death part thee and me." The lover could not be more delighted than ever when he received his precious evidence of her devotion to him both in prosperity and adversity. But the new machine, with its unfailing persistence of such pests, forced its way into universal use. What was the result? The appearance of the sewing machine produced for the first time the condition of the operatives of every trade where it was introduced. Hours of labor were lengthened from ten or eleven to eleven and ten hours a day; their wages rose from three and four shillings a week in England, to eight, twelve, fourteen, and even sixteen shillings a week. The work became more and more regular, and the whole aspect of the trade was changed for the better. But if the fact is considered any change in the condition of the machine operatives, it is certain that the introduction of the sewing machine was attended with great benefit to them. Death From Stage Fright.

Celia Logan, in a letter to the New York Dispatch, says:

I never knew of but one death occurring from "stage fright."

During my father's management in Cincinnati, a stage-struck young man with more money than brains, came to him with a proposition to buy an opening.

The company being full, my father could find no speaking part for him, but as he consented that he should appear as a supernumerary first opportunity that offered. The important hour soon came, and the ever ambitious youth was given a large share in defeating your father, you would not have spoken to me."

Munchhury and Workingmen.

The principal speakers at the so called "workingmen's meetings" held in various cities have alluded frequently to the lullmy done the working classes by the adoption of labor saving machinery. One spoke of the good old times when a man was able to earn an honorable livelihood for himself and his family by wheeling coal and elevating grain in a basket. Another said that machinery enabled the employers to control labor and reduce wages to starvation prices. Descending to epigram, he declared the machine to be the capitalists' servant but the workingmen's master. The argument between the advocates and opponents of labor saving processes and machinery is too full, too old and too tiresome to be reopened here. But it, as we believe is the case, a good many hundreds, perhaps thousands, of workingmen in Chicago believe the doctrines put out by the speakers at those meetings, it is worth while to place before them some of the evidence that they are wrong. All that is now said against machinery in general has been said specifically against every new invention. The steam engine, the knitting machine, the power loom, the railroad, have all met with the bitterest opposition from mechanics and workingmen. The latest case is most interesting. The same arguments in almost the same words that have been used in all these other cases were directed against the sewing machine. It would be employed to oppress the laboring classes, to lower wages. It would ruin journeymen tailors, and throw a million of women out of employment. Let us examine the evidence on these points in a very interesting paper by Mr. John Plummer, in the "Companion to the Almanac for Working People" issued in England. Before the sewing-machine was invented, the wages of needlewomen were absolutely at starvation point. In the "Song of the Shirt" the poor sewing woman, clad in unwommly rags, cries to Heaven that she and her children are "dying of cold and blood so cheap." In the trades in which men had to use the needle—making shoes, for instance, and manufactures of leather and of heavy sewn goods—a similar state of affairs prevailed, with the usual margin of superiority in favor of the male workers. But the whole class, male and female, were the worst paid, hardest worked and most unhealthy working people. Philanthropic efforts were made to better the situation, of the women especially. Associations were formed by the cry of wrong and suffering that burst out in the "Song of the Shirt," formed to assist and help the needle-women. All these efforts were in vain. The needlewomen, the shoemakers, the harness-makers and all the hard-worked by the needle demand sunk in squalor, poverty and wretchedness. Also the fine a new invention. It was resolved by the workingmen. It was certain, this sewing machine, to throw labor out of employment, and depress their already low condition. Flogging, Suicide and Schools.

The suicide of a London schoolboy twelve years of age is causing much talk in England. The little fellow had run away from Christ's Hospital School, and been brought back and had been flogged. A second time he ran away, and was not taken; but while shut up in a room to await another flogging, he put an end to his troubles by fastening around his neck the cord attached to the ventilator of his prison, and hanging himself. Wrigley came next morning to flog him, he was out of their reach. The Coroner's Jury, with the usual stupidity, rendered a verdict of "temporary insanity."

The verdict, however, has not settled the case. Mr. Serjeant Sturlock, in his seat in the House of Commons, asked the Home Secretary whether his attention has been called to the inquest on William Arthur Gibbs, at Christ's Hospital boy, twelve years of age, who was found by the jury to have committed suicide while in a state of temporary insanity, and whether, whether an inquiry is to be instituted into the treatment, as when, it is alleged, the boy was subjected? The least monster of the school desires that the boy was cruelly treated, and has placed a sad emphasis upon it. The same arguments in almost the same words that have been used in all these other cases were directed against the sewing machine. It would be employed to oppress the laboring classes, to lower wages. It would ruin journeymen tailors, and throw a million of women out of employment. But the new machine, with its unfailing persistence of such pests, forced its way into universal use. What was the result? The appearance of the sewing machine produced for the first time the condition of the operatives of every trade where it was introduced. Hours of labor were lengthened from ten or eleven to eleven and ten hours a day; their wages rose from three and four shillings a week in England, to eight, twelve, fourteen, and even sixteen shillings a week. The work became more and more regular, and the whole aspect of the trade was changed for the better. But if the fact is considered any change in the condition of the machine operatives, it is certain that the introduction of the sewing machine was attended with great benefit to them. The small boy in the shop was no longer a slave to his master, but was put up to the hands of another Mexican. For judges, an American was chosen by Magruder, a Mexican by his adversary, and the two together chose for the third a Frenchman. Then Magruder put his horse through his paces, first walking around the square, then trotting, then galloping, and finally putting the animal to top speed, with a magnificent jump that drew cheers and hand clappings from the crowd. After a few moments the Mexican came forward for trial. With out touching his hands to the animal he vaulted on his back and went through with precisely the same performance as had Magruder, and really proved himself to be the more accomplished horseman of the two. Magruder himself joined in the applause, and admitted frankly that he was fairly beaten. The Mexican smiled and bowed, and said: "Now, if the Senor will wait a moment I will show him a feat of horsemanship the like of which he has never seen."

Magruder assented, and the Mexican rode half way round the square, and then, putting spurs to the horse, disappeared in a cloud of dust.

"What the dickens does that mean?" said the owner of the horse.

"I only saw one man who can ride like that," said a bystander, "and that is Mollno."

"Molino, the guerrilla!" groaned Magruder.

"The same, sir. I don't think you'll ever see your horse again."

He never did, and the Mexican who held the stakes had also disappeared, and money and horse were gone together. Magruder never heard the last of this trick from his brother officers, and while his vexation lasted he was known as "the biggest fool in the American army."

Read this, Young Ladies.

We hear a very pretty incident the other day, which we cannot help relating. A young lady from the South, a widow, was wooed and won by a youthful physician living in California. When the happy consummation was about to take place, the young lady's friends, who were rich, having been very successful at San Francisco. It had not existed six months, however, when, by an unfortunate investment, he lost his entire "heap." This event came upon him, it should be added, just as he was about to be married. What does he do? Why, like an honorable and chivalrous young fellow as he is, he tells his young girl wrote the lady her particular of the unhappy turn which has taken place in his fortunes, assuring her that if she had entertained any change in her feelings toward him, she is released from every promise she has made him. He should not be surprised, he said, if she should see a lump of pure gold, which her love has sent her in his prosperity as a token that nothing in the shape of gold can change his feelings toward her. He turned to his manuscript, and went on writing, forwards it to him with the following Bible inscription engraved in the finest manner upon it: "Thine heart I give me not to leave thee, or to return from following after thee; for whither thou goest I will go, and whither thou lodgest will I lodge; thy people will be my people and thy God my God, where thou diest will I die, and there will I be buried; the Lord do so to me, and more also if aught but death part thee and me." The lover could not be more delighted than ever when he received his precious evidence of her devotion to him both in prosperity and adversity. The lovers soon again united their fortunes, and the young physician, and that he subsequently removed to the State of Indiana, where he lived and who loved him with such undying affection. Reader, this is all true, and we worked by the needle [illegible] Chicago Tribune.

—Mr. Smalley says that General and Mrs. Grant were treated with every courtesy at Windsor Castle by Queen Victoria. The Queen personally received them, and highly enjoyed their visit

THE New Hampshire State Prison has only 160 convicts, and the year just closed cleared above all expenses the sum of $8,000.

A Mortifying Mistake.

A well-known young lady of this city has made a most ludicrous mistake. A handsome and wealthy gentleman, whose acquaintance she has long desired to make, has been a regular attendant at her father's house for a month past, and seems quite well disposed to her. Last evening he called and was shown into the parlor, where the young lady was sitting alone. Thinking that each moment was precious, she determined to improve the opportunity, and, with a blush and a trembling voice, confessed a little fib she had told in order to make his acquaintance. She said that she had told her father that she had been married to a gentleman named Smith, when in fact she had not been married at all. She then asked him if he would not forgive her for telling such a falsehood. He looked at her in astonishment, and, rising from his chair, said: "Excuse me, madam, but I am married myself, and I have a wife living." The young lady fainted away, and when she recovered her self-possession the gentleman had left the house. He has not been there since.

A Prairie Minuet.

One autumn day, watching for ducks while ensconced on a muskrat house in the great Meadowby Marsh, which extends from Lake Koshkonong to the Mississippi River opposite Clinton, I noticed some objects moving on the remnant of a sandbar. By careful watching I discovered they were prairie-fowl, and, moved by curiosity, carefully approached them. As I drew near I discovered fifteen prairie-fowl apparently dancing a minuet. They were scattered about on the short turf, twenty yards apart, nodding their heads at one another, and presently two would run out and perform the figure which in a country dance is known as "cross over and back to places," all the while uttering a soft note of "coo-coo." The last syllable being much elongated. Then would follow "salute your partners" and "dos a dos." This species of merriment was sustained for half an hour and until I shot from a neighboring gun caused the birds to run into the tall cover of the reeds. [opyright simplune of autumn and the conspicuous group of native birds, impressed the scene vividly on the spectator's mind. A neighboring farmer, to whom the circumstance was mentioned, said:

"Them prairie hens is some birds saye around there mostly every day."

The other varieties of prairie-grouse indulge in the same kind of amusement.—Charles R. Whitehead, in Scribner's Monthly.

MESSRS. MONROE AND SETH GREEN have hatched out altogether 4,670,000 shad fry this year and turned them all into the Hudson River except 80,000, which were placed in the Black River, a tributary of Lake Ontario. This is 2,850,000 more fry than were hatched out last year.—N. Y. Evening Post.

HOME, FARM AND GARDEN.

—Fix up a decoction of walnut leaves to put on your horses and cows, and drive the flies away.

—A bit of cotton put into a bird's cage over night will attract the insects. The cage may be removed in the morning and burned at once.

—Farmers should make a careful distinction between tramps and the honest harvest hands who go about at this time of the season seeking work.

—Sunflowers, when no cockscrew is handy, can be puzzled how to remove the root of a bottle. Try this method: Fill the hollow at the bottom of the bottle with a handkerchief or towel, prop the neck with one hand, and strike firmly and steadily with the other upon the handkerchief.—American Cultivator.

—When planted in very rich soil, tomatoes often produce much wood and little fruit. The best crop of tomatoes I ever saw was furnished by plants whose roots were first somewhat checked in their growth as a sucking stick. All growths except the leaves and blossoms attached to the principal stem, but been pinched off as they appeared.—The Garden.

Tomato Honey.—To each pound of tomatoes allow the grated peel of a lemon, and as much fresh peach leaves (cut them small) as will fill all the pieces, then squeeze them through a bag, to each pound of liquid allow a pound of sugar, and the juice of one lemon; boil them together until they become thick jelly, then put into glasses.

—French Pickle.—Take three quarts of green tomatoes, three quarts cucumbers, and three quarts onions; two good handfuls salt; one-ounce celery seed, one ounce allspice, one ounce black pepper, ten cups mustard seed, one tablespoonful tumeric, one pound brown sugar, two tablespoons ground mustard, one gallon vinegar, cauliflower, put all in vine, let it stand two days, then boil it from three to four hours; this is splendid.

—A correspondent, discouraged at the many failures of prominent agriculturists about him, wants to know of us the true key of success. In answer we would say, it is an utter impossibility for a man to succeed sleeps, the exercise of muscles which never tire, the strain of muscles which never rest, the concentration of faculties which never blunch, and the concentration of the thought which never wanders from the business of the farm.—Iowa State Register.

—To Extinguish Kerosene Flames.—One of the most ready means is to throw a cloth of some kind over the flames, and then stifle them; but as the cloth is not always convenient in the kitchen, where such accidents are most likely to occur, some one recommends flour as a substitute, which, he said, promptly extinguishes the flames. Happily it absorbs the fluid, deadens the flames, and can be readily prying. Try and throw out of doors when the fire is extinguished.

—Ice-Cream.—To one quart of cream bake six ounces sugar, grate in one-quarter of a vanilla bean, strain it and put it into your freezer, add the whites of two eggs beaten very light, with three tablespoonfuls of powdered sugar to stiffen them. If your cream is not very rich, boil a little milk, sweeten it, beat two eggs very light and stir in and cook like soft custard. The flavor will perhaps be better if the vanilla bean is boiled a few minutes in a little milk, which may be added to the cream when cool.

—The Williams College Trustees voted, recently, to restore the degree of LL. D. on Representative Martin I. Townsend, of Troy, forgetting that he received that honor some years ago. The Troy Times makes its explanation: "It is said that the board has been entirely changed during the last decade, and that none of the present members were aware the honor had already been conferred. The Trustees discovered their error before the degrees were publicly announced, consequently Mr. Townsend's name was not called off at the Commencement Exercises."

"I hope," say I, "you understood her. I wouldn't have the presumption to say that of any woman," says Dolly Varden's father, in Barnaby Rudge.

H. R. STEVENS, M. D. Boston, Mass., Dec. 27, 1872.
Dear Sirs,—I have had dyspepsia in its worst form for the last twenty years, and have taken more than a hundred dollars worth of medicines without obtaining any relief. I was induced to try VEGETINE, and have taken in all about three bottles and can say that I am entirely improved. I have since taken three bottles more, and am now in better health than I have been for twenty years. I have recommended it to many of my friends, and they have all used it with the same success as myself. I am now in the employ of the Boston & Albany Railroad, and am on the road all the time. VEGETINE is sold by all druggists.

chalenged him, and though not quite successful, he nevertheless, practically brings the consignment to the most convenient manner. And now comes the crisis. Tom Puddlefoot was a beast, and his wife was treated worse than a brute. One day Jim hearing the frantic cries of Tom's dwelling and rescued the distressed wife. Then he received for me a divorce, and married his first love. Nearly everything went to smash in the "Paper City". Tom Puddlefoot failed, Lewis Bros. Bert got all possible converted into money and run away with the funds of the company. Gardner went to smash &c. &c.,

And now for the conclusion of the whole matter. The cultured will find some things to admire, but also some things to censure. He ought to have rewarded Darling Buttercup's better, than to have made her the half victim of the artful hypocrite, Charles Burt, and finally, an old maid school teacher in Chicago. So much it meant and little beyond what deserves better treatment. Burt's wife is given in caricature, but with skill and effect. It were well if those who steal away from home for real or imaginary discomforts would see themselves in this misery. The inflation and opulence that reigned, for a time, in New Canton has a partial parallel in some real cases. All in all, I do not vote to a very valuable contribution to our literature, and though I read it when too much indisposed for earnest efforts I am half entranced at the fact of having dropped it only to resume it and read it through. It may do some good I wish I could be assured it would not do any harm.

Mr Page has been an extremely successful and popular officer of the Indiana Road, and to his efforts is due much of the popularity of that road with the traveling public, especially with summer tourists, and his removal will be much regretted by the public with and for whom he has labored, and by all railway officials in the West, but his new position furnishes a larger field for his commanding ability and talents in his profession. He is to be succeeded by A. B. Leet, now general freight agent of the Grand Rapids & Indiana Road. Mr. Leet will attend to both the freight and passenger departments. He is a valuable and popular officer.

Large stock of the celebrated Imperial axe greese, best in use just received at Fox, Rose & Buttars.

SILLY.—Such senseless blather as the remarks of the editor of the Petoskey Democrat last week concerning the proposed Baptist Resort, can have only the effect to belittle their author in the minds of people who are posted on the subject in question. If Charlevoix could only claim as its stock in trade the brief and transient activity of a Methodist camp ground, its citizens would consider themselves poorly off indeed. What besides that has the settlement in which the Democrat is printed? We have a vivid remembrance of a certain town not far from here, which upon a time, was the rendezvous of a community of beggars, to aid which the charitable of far off sections were called upon. Charlevoix, meanwhile, was fat in its own prosperity. Take away the camp ground from Petoskey and it would only be the counterpart of its "other self" of two years ago. Let the Democrat give vent to its superfluous editorial wind and bombast in some other manner. It smacks to much of the fable of the toad and the elephant.

Cheboygan Items.

From the Cheboygan Tribune.

Messrs. Carkin, Stickney & Cram expect another dredge here the first of next week, when they will commence work on the harbor and push it right along.

We learn that the Chippewa county court house is now something near in the future. The contract for its construction was let a few days since to Messrs. Dewey & Bishop, of Detroit. The price for its construction complete is $18,150.

The tug W. S. Carkins arrived Thursday morning with Carkin, Stickney & Cram's dredge, No. 1, and two dumps in tow. She took on wood and left for Goderich.

The brig Pamlico, one of the vessels loading at this port last season with a cargo of timber for Bonaze direct, has been chartered to take a cargo of 300 tons of coal and 2,8020 cases carbon oil to Galveston, Texas, and to bring back a cargo of pine lumber from Cedar Keys, Florida to New York. She is to receive $5,000 for the round trip.

Carkin, Stickney & Cram's dredge No. 1, and two dump scows, with full crew, arrived Thuesday morning to enter upon the work of improving the harbor. The dredge, however is not of the capacity required by the contract, and Col. Durfee, the engineer in charge of the work refused to allow it to commence on the work. It is to be regretted that the contractors should have sent a dredge here of less capacity than their contract required, for it delays the work at a season of the year most favorable for it. The fall is fast appearing, when it is to be expected that more or less storms will prevail which will serve to retard the work. We hope to see the proper dredges soon upon the ground and busy at work.

RELIGIOUS RESORTS.

The History of a Brief Struggle— A Defeat and What Came of It.

At the last moment of grace, which was Tuesday last, our lethargic community seemed to partially awaken from their slumbers and realize that a savory morsel was within reach of their lips, and if sufficient strength could be mastered to open the mouth it might by some mysterious act of providence, roll in to please the palate, and appease the appetite. The facial effort was accomplished, but the bun passed on to gratify a hungrier and a greedier maw than ours.

Our citizens learned on Tuesday that the proposed Presbyterian Resort had had not yet been definitely located and that the committee were to meet at Petoskey on the day following to decide upon the spot. Knowing that at least half of the committee were favorable to this place, a meeting was called and steps taken which resulted in raising by subscription the amount of $625. and an arrangement made whereby 25 acres of the Stockman farm, at the foot of Pine Lake, be purchased and presented as a free gift to the committee, for the purpose named. A committee, consisting of Messrs Butters, Eaton, and Bartholomew were appointed to carry the proposition to Petoskey, which they did. But previous pledges made to the Little Traverse people seemed to have settled the question favorably to that point.

THE BAPTISTS.

But out of the ruins of the forlorn hope arose, Phœnix like, the outlines of realization. A delegation of prominent Baptists from Indiana consisting of Hon. Dr. Stone, Judge Zollars and John W. Hayden, were in Petoskey as a sort of self constituted committee, having in view the question of locating a resort for their society. They were easily prevailed upon to accompany the committee to this place. They were shown the ground, and through the village, and the beauties and advantages of this place pointed out to them. They expressed themselves convinced of the superiority of Charlevoix over any other point in this region as a location for a resort of the nature contemplated, and will recommend the acceptance of our proposition.

THE GROUNDS.

The grounds offered embraced all of the clearel and a part of the wooded portion of the land known as the Stockman farm. They do not extend north of the township road which passes east across the land, but a small tract reaching from the road to the bayou is to be included in the gift, which gives frontage on both Round and Pine Lakes. The ground rises from the lake by terraces which in perfection and symetry seem more like the work of an artificer than of nature. The scenery in any direction is of surpassing loveliness. No spot can be found that is better suited to the purpose contemplated than the spot described.

Buy the gale chilled plow, warranted to give satisfaction or no pay. Carpenter & Bartholomew keep them.

OUR ready to send in your meal and pork to the Petoskey needy. Camp meeting has closed.

LET the Democrat man put this in his pipe and smoke it. The commercial transactions of Charlevoix and its contiguous country for one day exceeds that of Petoskey for a week

NOTICE is hereby given that a public examination of all persons offering themselves as teachers for the schools in Charlevoix Township, will be held in the lower east room of the school building in the village of Charlevoix, on Saturday, Sept. 15, 1877, commencing at 9 o'clock a. m. In accordance with Act. No. 33, of the Laws of 1877, the "examining officer shall collect from each male applicant receiving a certificate, a fee of one dollar, and from each female applicant receiving a certificate, a fee of fifty cents."

WHEN BABY COMES.

What's back to in the house?
Like joy, lonesome no more,
Round the nursery most room,
Trouble alone is left?
Now Baby's come.

"Charley's nose is out of joint"
Sad he," sneers Ned, sly, sits pout
In the darkest little corner
Headcast of the growing class,
Miss Baby's come.

All the world has gone awry
To Charley's mind;
Lingly calls—But none obey.
For Baby's come.

"Bed" he cries. "Take Ace away!
I don't like her. She said I play
Quite big girl and fearful pop—
Charley' So is Mamma sing,
Since Baby's come.

Wondrous fair, the pillowing love
Encases the mother's heart of boy;
Ah! her head can hold the two—
Eyes of down and crimson blue,
When Baby comes.

Baby bring all love along,
Evil ogre has gone away,
Boundless wealth of heaven is
Never can be poor the less
When Baby comes.

What's blot of fatal pastime,
What a home! Look around
All the land world put to rout,
All the wide world in
When Baby comes.

'Tis a magic; on its shrine
Trouble sinks in the ocean,
Pain one. Her heaven dwells
In the sphere of every one,
When Baby comes.

Far the wild world's fret and snare
Endless harbinger every one;
Once again omnipotence is saved,
Life is young and fair the time
When Baby comes.

All the earth is made anew—
Fair by labor, and fair by love.
Why're a little his begins,
Ever of sorrow, Fate of sins,
And Baby comes.

WHEN THE SHIP COMES IN.

A sweet-faced woman and a sweet-faced child are wandering among the shipping docks of the young city. The woman is plainly dressed, but evidently in her best attire, and there is a touch of gentility in her finery, in the frail lace collar, relic of better days perhaps; the pearl ear-rings and the neat gloves. The child is neatly dressed, too, and she has gone the woman's hand, looks love at her guardian. But the woman's face is not at its best now, there is an anguished expression upon it, a careworn look, and a faint shadow upon the pale forehead that ages her and lessens the charm of her face.

Perhaps the anniversary of the death of the husband and father, Mr. Bobbin was elected President of the Association.

The balance of cash in the State Treasury July 1, 1877, was $685,384.04; receipts during the week ending Aug. 4 were $39,377.97; payments during same time were $21,617.95; balance in Treasury Aug. 7, 1877, $644,542.56; decrease for the week, $1,026.02.

Fires have again sprung up in the forests north of Bay City, and threaten to prove destructive.

Rh. ADAM SAGER, a member of the Faculty of Michigan University from 1853 to 1875, died, on the 9th, after some years of failing health.

The location of the Portage Lake (Mich.) Mining Gazette has a horrible story to tell. He says that he saw near that place a human skull rising from a water dipper in a road shanty occupied by a man who obtained the "death's head" years ago from a stripped grave on the beach near Copper Harbor, and has used it ever since as a household relic.

The total losses by the recent burning of the extensive salt and lumber works of W. H. Hart & Co., eight miles below East Saginaw, were $225,000, on which there was an insurance of $91,000. The salt block was the largest in the world and cost $600,000.

According to the Business Directory of Bay City, just issued, that city contains a tract of 5,000 acres, has a population of 17,000 souls, a real valuation of $13,500,000, and a bonded indebtedness of $186,320.

The salt product of the State during the month of July was 193,354 barrels. The total product for the season to August 1st was 781,595 barrels.

Leonard Clink committed suicide by hanging himself in a barn near Pewamo, on the evening of the 9th. Cause, financial trouble.

Arthur Van Pannwitz, a fireman citizen of Jackson, committed suicide on the 10th, by shooting himself in the right temple. Financial and domestic troubles are supposed to have been the inducing motives of the deed.

David Sullivan and George Siggins, two Detroit roughs, had a fight, on the 10th, which ended by the former throwing the latter off the dock into the water where he drowned, Sullivan refusing to render assistance.

The latest reports from Detroit give the following as the current prices for leading staples: Barley, State, per central, $1 20@1 30; Butter, per lb, 15@17c; Cheese, per lb, 10 @11c; Corn, per bu, 46@46c; Flour, White Winter, $7 0 @7 50; Amber, $6 75@7 25; Rye, $4 75@5 00; Cattle, per cental, $3 50@ 5 75; Hogs, $4 25@5 00; Sheep, $3 50@ 4 25; Oats, Mixed, per bu, 32@36c; White, 36@40c; Pork, per bbl, $14 25@14 50; Rye, per bu, 60@60c; Wheat, White, $1 26@1 30; Amber, $1 23@1 31.

An Unsolicitated Traveler.

I see Americans everywhere who still smell of salt water, and who are yet trying to appear as though they had been abroad every year of their lives. For three a nothing an American is so much afraid of as of seeming green. Put my part I rather like to be a greenhorn. Perpaps making my mistakes. I tell everybody on the cars thus that I'm an American, and am not used to this sort of thing, and then every man and woman in the cars keeps delighted to find some of those poor benighted Americans willing to confess his ignorance, that I am straightway overwhelmed with all sorts of information. I got up alongside the driver and say: "I don't often get a Yankee up here that don't know anything about Loghon do you?" Then coachee swings his whip and nudges me—he always nudges before he speaks—and begins to tell me that the Duke of Wellington lives here on the left, and the Mayor's of Wes'minster lives there. One of the drivers told me that he "showed Gen. Grant on an' back very much bowered since 'eed dined with the Lord Mayor." I told him I did not doubt it.

The pronunciation of the nether classes here is rather better in some regards than our own—the vowels are fuller and rounder. But I am satisfied at some words. The plural of "days" is plain if not quite identical with the Latin "dies," in the ordinary pronunciation. Of course the illiterate cockney is not assuming to an American as the nobleterel American is to the English traveler. It took me some time to find out that Somerstone meant "Somerset House," and when a driver pointed out what he called "the Bonk of Hengland," I had to look into the books of the building that it was the House of Outrection.

I try to learn away from Americans. I am in a very good hotel, but one of the most old fashioned of English hotels. "The Golden Cross" used to be a stalling place for the post-coaches, say in Pickwick's time, but it is now a rather unposh "quality hotel"—"quality" however, meaning old ways. I am, after a week's experience, beginning to learn how to manage things. I am never so well pleased as when I succeed in making some mistake sufficiently ridiculous to bring a smile to the face of an attendant in the place. Then I look so deadly solemn—these English folks about hotels—that I am driven to desperation with a desire to ask them what is the use if they can.—Edward Eggleston's London Letter to Evening Times.

What's back to in the house?
Like joy, lonesome no more,
Round the nursery most room,
Trouble alone is left
Now Baby's come.

"Charley's nose is out of joint"
Sad he," sneers Ned, sly, sits pout
In the darkest little corner
Headcast of the growing class,
Miss Baby's come.

All the world has gone awry
To Charley's mind;
Lingly calls—But none obey.
For Baby's come.

"Bed" he cries. "Take Ace away!
I don't like her. She said I play
Quite big girl and fearful pop—

Since Baby's come.

Wondrous fair, the pillowing love
Encases the mother's heart of boy;

Evil ogre has gone away,
Boundless wealth of heaven is

OUR NEW YORK LETTER.

Railroad Employes in France.

Yesterday we gave a record of the measures adopted by an Austrian railway company (which has been in success-ful operation for twenty years) for improving the condition of their employes, at the same time more permanently attaching the service of the Company, by providing assistance in case of illness, and pension in case of death or incapacity from long service. The Eastern Railway of France, one of the great corporations of that country, which has receipts amounting to $20,000,000 annually, has a system equally thorough and admirable, which is described in a pamphlet recently issued by the Railroad Gazette, and made up from certain lectures delivered by the Manager of the Eastern Railway before the French School of Bridges and Highways in 1867.

The Eastern Railway system begins at the beginning, by certifying its employes from among men whose previous career has shown them to be sober and industrious, and then making promotions, as vacancies occur, according to ability and term of service. This system is now in operation on all the French railways. The employes are graded, and there is never an appointment to a higher grade of a person who has not been in the employ of the Company in some inferior capacity. The admission of new employes is thus confined to the lowest grades of the service, so that the railroad business is learned thoroughly by all to whom its minutiæ must be intrusted. The plan is the more feasible because of the practice of selecting the new employes, as far as possible, from the children of the old employes, while they are still young men, many of them, indeed, begin as mere boys in the capacity of messengers or attendants. The judicial records of France assist the Company in protecting itself against vicious characters, since any previous bad conduct can be traced immediately when application for employment is made. Women are largely employed as ticket sellers, and they have proved themselves quick, accurate and polite. The wives and daughters of railroad employes are given the preference; and, in the case of the smaller stations where the train-master acts also as ticket-seller, an extra allowance of from $60 to $100 a year is made to his wife for assisting him. Women are also employed as gate-keepers at street-crossings on the line, and the trackmen's wives are generally selected.

Owing to the variation in the extent of business, the employes are divided into two classes, viz.: the "commissioned" men," who are regularly and permanently attached to the service, and the "ordinary men," who are engaged by the day, week or month. This establishes a reward for good behavior and earnest application from the first, as the lowest of a roustabout, a uniform and permanent tenure, inspires every man who enters the temporary service. This system of rewards is kept up in various ways. Thus the foreman and master foremen, the station gangmen, the switchmen and the watchmen, men, and so on, are divided into several classes, with a difference of $10 a year in the pay of each class. This arrangement extends to conductors, train-guards, clerks and other employes. Economy is practiced by a carefully-worded provision for station supplies to the agents, train-supplies to the conductors, stationery, pencils, etc., to the clerks, out of which they can provide what is necessary and make a small saving for themselves if they are careful. Some difference in pay is also made between those who live in large cities, where the cost of living is more consumerable, and those who live in the smaller towns. Employes are also given advantages in communication tickets for their families and reduced rates for the transportation of their supplies. Reasonable allowance is made for the repayment of counterfeit money and for indemnifying those who handle large amounts of money. It is also the custom to issue monthly orders, in which special acts of probity and attention to the Company's service are publicly acknowledged; regular gratuities are granted every year to those who have not been punished during that time, and special gratuities frequently made for exceptional services or great energy in case of a blockade, or fire, or other accident. All the employes are uniformed; the Company assumes two-thirds of the expense of the clothing, and 3 per cent. of the wages is retained for the remainder. Thus in 1866, 4,000 men were uniformed at an expense of $89,681, of which the employes paid $41,091 and the Company $67,573. A certain leave of absence is granted every year, and provision made for the allowance of pay and part-pay during illness, according to the time of service in the iron work Building houses, the furnishing of coal at a used and low price, the furnishing of cold drinks in summer and hot drinks in winter to the laboring men, and a monthly indemnity when the price of bread rises to an extraordinary point, are also features of the system.

All that has been described so far is done by the Company itself; the further provisions in case of sickness and infirmity are furnished by the joint efforts of the Company and the employes. There are "Provident Funds" and a "Pension Fund" for the Provident Funds, the employes pay monthly 1 per cent. of their salary, which may be increased on extraordinary occasions, but must never exceed 2 per cent.; the Company always pays into this fund an amount equal to the aggregate amount paid in by the employes. Out of the "Provident Fund" a sick or disabled employe receives half his wages, beginning from the time when the Company ceases to pay him full wages, which the Company pays during the first two months of illness or disability. This fund pay, the medicines, physicians and nursing, the hospital expenses, expenses for trips to watering places, funeral expenses and contributions to families of deceased members, form the chief drafts upon the "Provident Fund." Of course, the administration of this fund is protected by strict regulations, under the immediate supervision of the officers and physicians of the Company.

The "Pension Fund" is distinct from the "Provident Fund." It is made up by an assessment of 2 per cent. on the salaries of employes and a contribution from the Company equal to the aggregate of the assessments. The minimum age of a retiring pensioner is fifty years, and the minimum period of service twenty years. The funds are dispensed on the Tontine plan. A pensioner's proportion of the fund is determined by dividing the sum of salaries earned by him during his whole term of service by the sum of the salaries received by the whole force during the same term, and multiplying the result by the amount in the fund, which yields the amount on which an annuity is paid. The annuity must never exceed, however, the sum of $1,200 a year; and, if the surplus shows a larger sum than this, the surplus reverts to the fund. The pension applies in the case of death after ten years of service; it is then so divided that the widow receives one-half and the minor children one-half; or, in the case of the death or second marriage of the widow, the deceased employe's children get the benefit of the annuity till they severally become of age. When employes are dismissed or accused of the abolition of their positions before the term of service expires which entitles them to the pension, they are entitled to the restoration of what they have paid into the fund, but when they are discharged for cause they have no claim on the Company whatever. The fund is administered by the operating officers and the Directors of the Company, and an account is rendered the council of Administration every three months.

M. Jacquin, the Manager of the Eastern Railway, has furnished tables showing the term of service in the various departments and branches, which prove that this system has exerted a direct influence on the permanency of the staff. The great majority of the train-masters, conductors, passenger and freight, brakemen of both classes, foremen and sub-foremen of engine houses, engineers and firemen have been in the employ of the Company over five years, and their term of service ranges from that to more than twenty-five years. The same corps (not identified with the welfare of the road, and the system is worthy of the attention of our leading railroad managers in America.—Chicago Tribune.

A Flow of Forensic Eloquence.

Judge Stutsman's Court Room was crowded yesterday morning, for there was an interesting case of assault and battery on hand. Thomas Douglass and Elson Trumbull, both residents of West Hill, got into a dispute about the President's policy, which terminated in a row, in which it appeared Mr. Trumbull climbed Mr. Douglass' fence, put a head on him, blacked his eye, wrenched his neck, spraul his nose all over his face, gibbed him heavily on the listening, bored him on his left-hand rising merriment.

"May it please the Court," Mr Gastolet again began, and the Court, despite its stern official dignity, looked so positively and undeniably pleased, that not a disturbing murmur was heard. "Gentlemen of the jury, this is not a case for levity. It is rather a case for profound thought." Here a juror who was asleep at the end of the lunch fell off and punctuated Mr. Gastolet's eloquence with a prodigious crash, after which order was restored and Gastolet, who had broken out into a profuse perspiration, went on:

"A cause," he said, "for profound thought, and for sorrow; for deep-felt, patriotic sorrow. What do we see, gentlemen, what do we see? An American citizen, half white and free born. An American citizen—and what vicious dew that word conjures up. Liberty strangled by the iron heel of a pitiless despotism; a little band of patriots penniless in purse and few in numbers struggling to undergo the hated manacles that mind her to the earth. The glowing sunrise flats with touch of gold the verdant brow of Bunker Hill, crowned with the coronet of cumparts, glittering with dewdrops, behind which our fathers crouch, like lions in the lair. The dim cloud of battle palls the reeling earth and bending heavens from my sight. The tramp of charging columns shake the earth and the loud-mouth cannon wake the echoing echoes with more resonant tones than even the reverberating echoes of heaven's dread artillery. The pitiful glitter of the bayonet answers the licking tongues of red, red flame. The smoke cloud lifts. Oh, horrid sight! Oh, merciless deed!"

Here Mr. Gastolet threw up his hands and bending backward in a rigid attitude of pain, exhibited a portion of the jury, that the big fat junior in the middle, who was at that moment stealthily taking a dose of the court, thought the gesture in reference to himself, and guiltily dropped his chew on the floor, and hid his tobacco box behind his leg, and braced himself up to deny that he ever used tobacco. But Mr. Gastolet went on, in a loud expression of voice.

"The dead are crawling over the hillside! The wounded lie rightly weltering in their gore! Freedom shrieks in the dim distance and nature veils her face, aggnifier, at the awful sight! A nation is born and the blood of heroes is poured out like water upon the altar of its christening. And for what? For what, gentlemen? Eight years of blood and war and famine and pestilence; eight cruel years of patriotic struggle; eight long years of the sword; eight years of heroic endurance and god-like courage—for what? To hand down to posterity a government that will demand that my client shall tamely submit to be slapped in the face with a breeching-strap and make no sign? Slapped in the face with a breeching-strap, and fall with his dumb, cold lips in the dust at the feet of his oppressor? No, by the smoke of our liberty loving and heroic sires, never, gentlemen, never! No, hand our manhood, no, gentlemen! I leave my client's cause in your hands, with serene confidence in your unbroken love of justice, and your devotion to that spirit of freedom and independence, the dearest heritage of our godlike sires, which will not brook oppression nor tolerate tyranny, but in its unjust taxes, tyrannous laws, or stinging breeching-straps. Gentlemen the case is in your hands."

And the jury brought Mr. Trumbull in guilty of domestic violence in the first degree, and the Court fined him forty dollars and send him up for eighteen days.—Burlington Hawk Eye.

Scenes on the Ganges.

The great sight of Benares is me bathing in the Ganges. We were early there, drove down in the river, and, getting a boat, were rowed slowly for hours up and down the stream. It was a fine sight. Many of the palaces, which descend to the water's edge, are of dark material anything but bleached, with a dark, reddish-colored straw hat, not recently purchased. Its few folds of pale brogans, with cotton socks which might make been several days in the wash, were an inch or two longer, he remarked, than a careless, well-to-do stock-buyer or farmer ought to wear; rather than the chief financial agent of it's great nation. Its conversation he is affable, and when Lafe Pence forgot to give a newspaper correspondent, which, by the way, is his especial aversion, he is free and somewhat careless in his oaths.

—Here are three versions anecdotes of Dr. J. G. Holland, of Scribner's, whom the Sun irreverently thinks "Topper Holland." Last year some one sent him what he had read "Daniel Deronda." "Now," he replied, "the fact is I intend myself to write that book, and I don't care to read anyone else's book. I wish to be Original." Some one once said in his hearing that Prof. Fowler and his phrenological examinations were humbugs. "Yes, no," hurriedly interrupted Timothy Titcomb; "it was very useful to me, for it showed me I was nearly half decayed, and other birds were fluttering over it. But this is too common a sight in Benares to make much of a stir in the blood of the Hindoo, whose prayer is that he may die on the banks of the Ganges. Does his prayer avail him? Not always. If he come loud for the fowls of the air, his soul floats to its final rest in the Deity as sure as the Ganges flows and to those of the Hindoos that the nearest male relative applies the torch. Here was a body with the feet and hands of which were wrapped in coarse garments, perhaps all that affection could give. Beside it stood a boatman ready, as it with eager eyes, lest any rude hand should touch the form which, though dead, was still beloved, to push away the bosom of the sacred river. Another pile was a mass of ashes and burning fiercely. I stood close to it till driven away by heat and smoke. As the flames in bowed from the form, portions of the body were exposed. Now the hair was consumed in a flash, leaving the bare skull; now the feet dropped from the other end of the pile. It was a ghastly sight. Now a horrid smell filled the air, and still the pile glowed like a furnace, crackling with the intense heat, and shot out tongues of flame that seemed eager to lick up every drop of blood.

Perhaps a stranger can enter into the feeling with which the devout Hindoo regards the sacred river. However we upbraid the sacred river of India, we find a wealth of associations gathering around it such as belongs to no other river on the face of the earth. Each other is so intimately connected with the history and the whole life of a people. Other rivers have peculiar and patriotic associations. The ancient Romo kept watch on the Tiber, as the modern Germans keep watch on the Rhine. But here are associations of country and of patriotic pride—not of life, not of science, not of religion. In these respect the only river in the world which approaches the Ganges is the Nile. What the N is to Egypt, the Ganges is to a part of this, giving life and wealth to plains that for it were a desert. As it bursts through the gates of the Himalayas, and sets along with restless current, cools with its icy breath the hot plains south, and giving fertility to the far field. It has, too, a history well known to the Hindu the greatest visible emblem of Almigh power and infinite benificence.

But it is more than an emblem. The ancient Egyian worshiped the Nile as a god, and this day has had the same feeling which exists among the Hindoos in regard to the Ganges. It is not only a sacred river—a river of religious rites—it is itself Dis. Being, like the River of Life in book of Revelation, out of the throne of G. It descends out of heaven rising in mistake where [illegible] the mountains which form the Hindoo'plas, or Heaven, the abode of the Hon Trinity—of Brahma and Shiva and Vishnu. Rushing from under a glacier the region of everlasting snow, it see as if it rushed from the throne of God, and in the blood of the Hindoo, whose prayer is that he may die on the banks of the Ganges. Does his prayer avail him? Not always. PERSONAL AND LITERARY.

—William H. Newell, of Gilmantan, N. H., and his wife, are a remarkable pair. Mr. Newell is ninety-one years old and his wife eighty-four. During the last winter he has made a large sawdust and bookcase of excellent workmanship. This season, besides attending to a large garden, he has planted and hoed 400 hills of pole beans. The old couple drive long distances to visit friends, and are as vigorous and enthusiastic as young married folks. They have twelve children, including one lawyer, one doctor, two clergymen, one carpenter, one merchant, one artist, one manufacturer and four married daughters. They have also many grandchildren and ten great grandchildren, and not one of the whole number drinks spirituous liquors, uses tobacco or swears.

—Secretary Sherman is thus described by a person who saw him during his recent trip to New England: "His personal appearance is striking, if nothing pleasing. Over six feet tall, lean and lank, he is the type of a true Westerner. Orderly dressed, wearing a suit of dark material anything but broadcloth, with a dark, reddish-colored straw hat, not recently purchased, his few folds of pale brogans, with cotton socks which might make been several days in the wash, were an inch or two longer, he remarked, than a careless, well-to-do stock-buyer or farmer ought to wear; rather than the chief financial agent of it's great nation. Number two of the kick is the most important of any, and, strange to say, the one most neglected by self-taught swimmers. It is actually the propelling power of swimming; for when the legs are brought firmly together, the body is shot forward. Therefore, the wider the legs are kicked apart, and the firmer they are guided together, the greater will be the speed attained. Every swimmer should bear this constantly in mind.

The instructions as to the movement of the ankle-joint, in number three, should also be borne in mind, as it is indispensable to perfection in swimming, and is done so that there may be as little friction as possible when the feet are being forced to the stroke. The toes are turned out again, to allow of the feet being kicked with less waste of strength than could otherwise be the case. Do not bend the knees in the water, the limbs should be used like sweeps, and be stuck stiff, and make no effort to raise the head above the surface of the water, beyond the level, the head being very slightly raised.

Many swimmers experience difficulty in turning themselves in the water, and have no difficulty at all in breathing as regularly in the water as when walking on land, secondly, there is a most agreeable feeling of learning it has been got over. The instruc and best of our living swimmers have the mouth and nostrils immersed in the water for at least two-thirds of the time they are swimming. This, also, is the case with a number of overland stroke, accounts for the very fast swimming that is being performed, at the present time especially. The mouth and nostrils lie deepest in the water at the beginning of the stroke, and as the head is turned to the side outward, and keep the ankles perfectly stiff.

At "two," bring the knees, both turned downward, and, without jerking, bring the legs together, joint for joint.

At "three," bring the feet close up to the body, the heels touching and the knees again turned to the side, the toes to be pointed sideways immediately the feet are close to the body.

Practice these movements slowly; distinctly and separately, until each one is performed perfectly. Then begin the movements of arms and legs simultaneously as follows:

At "one," put the arms out in front, and kick the legs wide apart.

At "two," bring the arms round, describing the quarter circle, at the same time pulling the legs together until they touch.

At "three," return the hands to the original position, and bring the heels close up to the body, knees not being turned out.

Work, with legs and arms in unison, slowly at first, and counting each movement, in silent time the motions will be performed quite mechanically, and, once the legs are learned, they are not easily forgotten.

The following hints in reference to the movements will be of some service to the learner in swimming, and will be found useful:

While performing the first part of the kick, insure the legs are as wide apart as possible from each other, the effort being made to kick sideways and backward, not downward. The reason for this are obvious. In the first place, kicking downward gives an ungainly jerk to the body, spoiling the smoothness of the stroke, and is also a waste of strength, as, it sends the body, or part of it, out of the water, while every effort should be made to propel the body forward.

RECENT reports of the famine in India represent that the stricken area contains 18,000,000 sufferers dependent for food upon the activity and exertions of those who transport grain to the country; that the Madras Presidency was powerless to satisfy their wants, and that all aid that could be secured was necessary to the salvation of life. Over 500,000 people had perished, and more had been found dead one single morning than in any during the whole Bengal famine. Passenger trains had been partially discontinued on the roads to enable relief trains to get through, and a frantic appeal for assistance has been sent to the principal cities of England, Scotland, Ireland and India.

MARCUS MONAHAN, aged eighty-one years, was killed at Detroit, on the morning of the 16th, by an insane son, who struck him on the head with an axe. The father had sent him to chop wood, on which he went into a crazy rage, with this fatal result. He made no effort to escape, and went peaceably with the officers, saying, "I killed father because he was killing me with his talk." The dying Monahan was well known, and was the oldest resident of one of the largest Irish families in Detroit. The son is about forty, and has been deranged twenty years.

A Tramp's View of Idleness.

He came in sunny and laboriously, as if five tons of weariness were weighing down his spirits.

He dropped heavily into a chair, sighed several four-foot sighs, and then bombarded us with the following conundrum:

"What is idleness? What does it consist of?"

"Don't know. Never experienced it."

"Now, some people would call doing nothing idleness, wouldn't they?"

"I suppose they would."

"Or, and that's where some people make a mistake. There is as much doing as idleness. No man is ever wholly idle; if his body isn't busy his brain is. I know that if a man sits around and shows a disinclination to work, folks will call him a tramp and a cucumber of the ground,' as Shakspeare says; but it don't make any difference. It isn't so, and I can produce plenty of proof to sustain the position I take in the matter. Now, for instance, who ever heard of Napoleon getting up at five o'clock in the morning and starting out to the field with a hoe over his shoulder, or chaining a side-hill plow around a field lasting hours a day? Did Napoleon ever do that?"

"Never heard that he did."

"No, and he wouldn't have suited his intellect, and when he had any real work to perform, thousands of men were ready to do the drudging. That's the sort of a man Napoleon was. He never sawed a cord of wood or did a hard day's work in his life, and I maintain that his generalship for strategy, and no interfering policeman ever came nosing around and told him to move on or get in the land of the law would snatch him to the jug.

"Then look at Diogenes! What sort of a man was he? One of the most prominent figures of history do we find on the credit side any entry of this kind:

Diogenes, Cr.

"By one day's work..... $1.00?

"Nothing of the sort. Diogenes was a man who took the world easy. He only thing he ever did that we have any record of was pawing around the streets of Syracuse with an old lantern in his hand. He pretended to be looking for an honest man. Does likely he was mapping out a free-lunch route. Cursed for Diogenes.

"Now turn over another page and glance at the pursuit of Sir Isaac Newton. Wasn't he a thoroughbred tramp? All he did was to sit out in his garden under an apple tree, smoke his old clay pipe, and build castles in the air. One day an apple picked off the tree and struck Sir Isaac square in the head. The circumstance made him famous. Why? Because he was a genuine, philosophical tramp, and took things easy. When the apple hit him he didn't get mad and throw a three cornered greek words around through the atmosphere, as some would have done, but simply picked the apple up, looked it over carefully for worm-holes, and ripped it in his pocket for an after supper. Then he began to wonder why the apple didn't go up instead of falling down to the ground. Before that he had never paid any attention to the matter, and he didn't know whether it was the moon and stars that moved, or the earth. He put in pregnery, refresh your senses with rural sights and sounds; go and look at trees and flowers; listen to the birds and the music of running waters; follow this plan and you'll know it's me. Ta, ta."

And the weary man arose and slowly glided forth—never, we hope, to return.—Puck.

THE SENTINEL.

WILLARD A. SMITH, Editor and Proprietor.

CHARLEVOIX, - - MICHIGAN.

THE UNFINISHED LETTER.

NEAH DELWOOD.

"DEAR JENNY:

"We reached here this morning.
Have been 'at home' to Ireland, lately;
So you see that in spite of your warning,
The call of our country is high.

"The redskins, they say, are worse worth a mention,
Don't worry us at the Derby.
Have shown us no blue abstinence—
Confound them—hang on out way

"Poor Ned got a ball in the shoulder—
Another one just grazed my side—
But I'm here as well as a day older
Well be a, the end of our ride.

"We've camped here for breakfast. Tom's spitting,
Some kind of wood on the fire place.
And strike a stick over I'm sitting
To hastily pen you these lines.

"A courier from headquarters we met him
Just now with a mail for the rearies,
(Ah, Jenny! I'll never forget him)—
For this need unbiggedly wearies.

"He says, too, the prisoners are mending
The duties of a day every man.
Halting here cannot long—he's attending—
And running to tell you—Ta, ta.

"It's nothing, I guess; he is only
At once of his practical—"Bang!
And short through sigh, but suffices wholly,
The crack of hoofs rifle-shots range.

And as the dire scales came blanded
With blood from the fingers of grass,
The letter to Jenny was ended—
Its writer lay dead on the pass.

THE MUSIC OF THE WATERS.

And so all I had to do was to go into the country and enjoy myself for six weeks—that is what it came to.

Why, if anyone had struck me with a feather at the moment the doctor uttered his verdict I should certainly have been knocked down; fortunately, no such atrocity was attempted, so I maintained as erect a posture as my enfeebled health would allow until the eminent licentiate of the College of Physicians, whom I was consulting, began to rise to remove our seat.

"You are utterly smoke dried," he said square in the face, "Liquid refreshment made him famous. Why? Because he was a genuine, philosophical tramp, and took things easy. When the apple hit him he didn't get mad and throw a three cornered greek words around through the atmosphere, as some would have done, but simply picked the apple up, looked it over carefully for worm-holes, and ripped it in his pocket for an after supper. "You are utterly smoke dried," he said square in the face, "Liquid refreshment is the only thing for you."

"Bully," he answered. "No physic, fresh air is all you want—mountain air, if possible; perfect rest and quiet; absolute quietude, early hours and no tobacco."

"But," I feebly protested, "I don't care about the country; how am I to fill up my time?"

"Nonsense; you know nothing of it, from your own showing, and as to occupation, anything will do, so that you keep clear of your ledgers. Fish, sketch, bile, read poetry and listen to music; go and study Cockneydom in greenery, refresh your senses with rural sights and sounds; go and look at trees and flowers; listen to the birds and the music of running waters; follow this plan and you'll know it's me. "Why, there she is in the garden at this moment, and how beautiful she looks! Now that I have made myself presentable," I thought, "I will go down immediately and thank her like a coherent being and a gentleman."

She was sitting in a little arbor at the end of the inn garden. As I approached, a blush, the more evident from the paleness which her unusual exertion and subsequent faintness had left, overspread her sweet face—that angel face, which I had at first thought, a dream, and which to me now with my newly awakened sensual sensibilities, scarcely seemed a reality.

I cannot describe it. Why should I? Other people would not see it with my eyes; there were hundreds and hundreds of faces in the world doubtless far more beautiful.

"I hope you are feeling better," I said. "I am afraid that what you have done for me has overtaxed your strength; I shall never forgive myself if it has made you seriously ill."

"Oh, no," she answered, "I was only a little out of breath with the running and the scramble through the brushwood and trees; But I was sure that if I was to be of any use there was no time to be lost. Please don't say any more about it."

"Oh, but indeed I must, you must tell me how you saw me and how you were able to reach me."

"Oh, I had merely gone down to look at the waterfall—I knew it would be very much swollen—and the moment I came upon it, to my horror and surprise, I saw you standing upon that rock in the middle of the river. I felt sure that you would be drowned; but before I could even call out you were washed off it and I saw you carried away. Well, I don't know what it was that made me do it, but I ran along through the wood by the side of the river as fast as I could. I don't suppose I had a thought of being able to save you, but it all seemed so dreadful; and then I lost sight of you. But I still ran on to near the top of the second fall, and got close down to try if I could see you; the trees were so thick up above that I was obliged to get close to the edge. I was looking all about for you, when I suddenly saw you just underneath where I was standing, and trying to reach that bough. Well, then I pushed it down to you, that's all."

"All, indeed!" I cried. "Can I ever repay you for that 'all?' You simply saved my life; I should never have got out for you."

"Hope you are not much the worse for your ducking, sir?" here broke in her father's voice. "I and my wife hope that you will give us the pleasure of your company at dinner this evening; you must have a little chill and lonely here by yourself."

Of course I would, and of course I did, and, of course, I spent the very pleasantest evening I had ever known in my life. I told the family who I was and all about myself; and they told me a good deal about themselves—father, mother and two daughters—and how they had come out for their annual run, as every one called it, and how they often made very pleasant acquaintances on their little tours.

But it's not worth while," said my host, "that we make one in this fashion; it is not to be wished. We don't expect to be anything but commonplace people, and one hears of a domestic drama every day. Its, in' but, by Jove, it was very lucky Lucy saw you."

And so on, and so on.

After this evening followed a succession of the most delightful hours I had ever known; morning, evening and noon were spent in the company of my new acquaintances, and at the end of a very few days those acquaintances had become fast friends. I was as completely over head and ears in love as I had been over head and ears in the turbulent water, and I told her so.

"Save me once more," I said: "give me that hand once again, and let it be mine forever; otherwise it would have been kinder to have left me to drown out right."

She dropped her head, but held out her hand, that hand which at this moment has just touched my arm, as a silvery voice says:

"Come, Billy, stop; I have been peeping over your shoulder. You need not write any more; people can guess the rest. I would rather you did not enter into details."

"Very well, dear," I answered; "as it is nearly twenty years ago since it all happened, perhaps you are right. Yes, settled down for twenty years: who would think it! And a week or two we must be off, for the nineteenth time together, on another holiday diversion. What shall it be, and where shall we find it?"

"O, I am still all for the country, you know," she cries. "I am never tired of rural sights and sounds."

"Nor I," is my reply: "well go where—

"Gentle winds and waters near as Byron says. Fancy my quoting Byron! What a transformation in a man! Only we shall not be lonely, shall we?"

"Indeed, no," she says; "we will only take care not to sit in the dry beds of mountain streams when we want to listen to the music of the waters."—London Society.

"Yes, we have our trials and tribulations, same as other people," answered one of the small keepers at the Central Market when interviewed the other day. "I for one study human nature, but never interfere with it. Ten minutes ago a handsome and stylish lady got out of her carriage over there, sailed down to my stand, and with all the dignity of a queen she asked: 'Mr. Beans, have you any red nice huckleberries?' I replied: 'Madam, I have the best lot of huckleberries in market,' and I sold her two quarts. Five minutes later another lady came along and called out: 'Mr. Beans, have you any cheap whortleberries?' I replied, 'Madam, I have the cheapest whortleberries in the world,' and she took fourquarts. It's all the same to me, sir, whether they put the 'huckle' or the 'whortle' to you—my business is to please the public."—Detroit Free Press.

OUR NEW YORK LETTER.

New York, August 31, 1877.

I am not a mirror-maker enough to know whether your readers were treated to the same show or not, but we of New York have been indulged in an eclipse this week. Of course we admit that it was in the highest degree condescending for the earth to get in the moon's way in that style, and perhaps it was our duty to get out the tea-urns and tiepans at the Astatic function do under like circumstances and accept it as of its proper position, but as our Government policy is at present one of strict non-intervention we make no action in the matter further than to shut ourselves in our front doors or windows to watch for a moon that didn't come off. Presently a the moment when the Orb this should have shown her countenance above the sands of Long Island, our own planet had shut off the whole supply of radiance which she usually obtains at second-hand from the orb of night, nor did we begin to get out of our own light until the latter got up several degrees above the horizon. Then came the rest-ous sight of a full moon gradually appearing out of the darkness of a clear sky. If the silver goddess is still inclined to bashfulness she must have suffered at this juncture, for the number of telescopes and opera glasses directed at her from the metropolis alone was enough to disconcert Lucky Thirteen herself.

That courageous lady let the way at present aiding those Gothamites who are doomed to stay at home during the hot weather, to while away the closing days of summer at Wallack's. Theatre where with her blondes she is giving the burlesque of "Blackbeard". The other theatres are showing more activity as the regular fall season approaches. At the Union Square the attraction is Pink Dominos, one of those French plays which our dramatists take and giving them a very thin and transparent coat of moral whitewash present to American audiences as "reformed". At the Park "Baby" persists in proving himself a success. At Niblo's a sharp manager is reaping a golden harvest, the result of a novel piece of managerial ingenuity. He has hit upon the plan of scattering broadcast tickets of admission good for the gentlemen bearer only when accompanied by a lady. These tickets have no reserved seats attached and as of course no gentleman is going to take a lady to the theatre and make her stand through a five act play, the holder invariably goes to the box office and gets reserved seats paying therefore prices varying with location. The bait takes so well that the large house is crowded every night and the ingenious proprietor is hugging himself for his smartness. I rehearse the little tale as a hint for your local managers.

At the remaining theatres the Chinese bubble is beginning to burst. The 6th Avenue is still prattling by the antics and pig-tail of Mr. Parsloe, the inimitable Ah-Sin of Heate and Twain's "Heathen Chinee." This will be continued for another week, when the first of a promised list of sensation will be brought out in the shape of a new play by Augustin Daly entitled "Our City." At the Broadway, "Washee-Washee" has a prominent position in Joaquin Miller's maiden dramatic effort which he calls "The Danites," the action of which is located, according to the approved traditions of the American drama, amid the red shirted and blood-thirsty scenes of Californian life. There has been a good deal of curiosity exhibited to see how the talented and eccentric poet would succeed in this branch of literary work. The verdict after the first performances inclines to be favorable, though the critics are as usual conscientiously trying to earn their salaries by making fun for it.

The Chinaman is getting to be an object of attention in other relations than those of the mimic stage. About a dozen of him were up this week before the U. S. Commissioner for selling unstamped cigars. No description could convey an idea of the blandness and child-likeness of their yellow faces when arraigned to answer. It seemed as if butter wouldn't melt in their mouths when they bullstated that they understood nothing of the charge or of the language, nor when, having that that couldn't work, they set up the untruth at further defense that their cigars being entirely made of cabbage leaves, did not come under the tobacco laws. Altogether, they proved too much for the Commissioner who, unable to make anything of them, finally discharged the whole lot after a severe reprimand which of course rolled off them like water off a duck's back.

They are by no means such fools as they look, these seven wooden-stool tenants. Not long ago, one of them, whom I will call Ah Sam, procured from another, who shall be designated as Ah Ling, about $120, in money which the obliging Ah Sam told his compatriot ought to be deposited to the latter's credit. So the two went together and made the deposit taxing a receipt for it in Ah Ling's name. This receipt Ah-Sam retained saying that he would keep it safe till Ah Ling should want it. Next day the perfidious Sam returned to the place of deposit alone, assumed the identity of Ah Ling, produced the receipt and said he wanted his money. One of these heathens looks so much like all the rest that the cashier, naturally suspecting nothing, counted out the $120, but said he must have the signature of Ah Ling to the receipt. Sam readily acceded to this, and made on the paper a ten cheet character which he natural the confiding stamp—slinger was Asatic for that name. Shortly afterward the genuine Ah Ling discovered the ways that were dark of his benighted brother and tore his pigtail in an equal mixture of wrath and anguish. He rushed to the cashier, explained the circumstances and received the advice to have Ah Sam arrested for forging his name to the receipt. This counsel was acted upon and Sam was hauled before the bar of Justice. He was observed to smile sweetly when the charge was preferred, but said nothing. The cashier excitedly produced the receipt, and showed it to Ah Ling for identification. No sooner had the latter fixed his slant-indicular gaze upon the signature than he gave vent to what was probably a Mongolian expective, and began to sputter to the interpreter, who at once announced the unexpected development that the signature was not Ah Ling but Ah Sam. Of course the latter had committed no forgery in signing his own name, and therefore, to the dense bewilderment and indignation of the wronged Ah Ling, the charge was dismissed. The wily Sam, who throughout had sat with the same half closed eyes and innocent smile, glided peacefully out, whispering softly as he went, "Melican man he thinee he damsmarter; allee same China man teachee he one tree four nlee trick."

CURIOUS PICK-UPS.

The pick-ups, the findings, from underground or underseas, or in hidden places above ground comprise a strange medley of the odd and the choice, signalling to the tastes or the pockets of persons filling widely different positions in society.

The drains and sewers, for instance can a more lowly and uncomfortable inventory-house than these be found? But killing by dogs, in an inclosed space surrounded by the roughest rongis, is a savage exhibition, unfortunately not yet quite dead out among us. The exhibitors purchase the live rats at so much per dozen from men who grope along the filthy sewers in search of them; and in Paris, especially, dead rats are brought up from the same unseemly regions, and placed in the hands of skilled sanitarians, who manage to get out of them strong and good-looking pieces of leather suitable for the manufacture of gloves. The great sewage mains in recent years in London by the extensive Main Drainage Works have deprived the sewer grubbers of many a good chance, but in the old sewers the pick-ups were often strange enough. Dead infants, school satchels, and bags full of silver and steel, spoons, tobacco-boxes, children's playthings, bad half-crowns and shillings, sets of false teeth, walking sticks, penknives, and all manner of articles that had been thus hidden from view, are among these discoveries.

A laborer, digging a drain in a farm on the estate of the late Lord Palmerston, found a golden torque of the ancient British necklace. It was ascertained that the original grant of the estate gave to the grantee, as long as he kept up a right to all treasure-trove found there; in the veteran statesman established his claim, but took care that the finder should not go unrewarded. A plowman, working near Bordslean in Hants, found more than a hundred old silver coins in a northern jar under the surface of the ground; the lord of the manor gave to the finder the intrinsic value of the coins as mere silver, and then had to fight a battle with the Crown as to who ought to possess the coins themselves. One find near Highgate was very remarkable, on account of the strange manner in which the veritable owner made his appearance. Laborers, grubbing up a tree in a field, found ten jars containing nearly four hundred sovereigns; they divided the money amongst themselves, and were then taken before the lord of the manor claiming it. Before this claim could be investigated, a tradesman came forward and stated that one night, under a temporary delusion, he had gone out and buried the money; when he awoke, and for some days after, he tried in vain to recollect the locality he had selected, and only obtained a clue when he heard a rumor of the finding of 400 sovereigns. He was able to bring forward sufficient evidence in support of his singular story, and his claim was admitted.

On different occasions, in 1884, the Crown put in claims for treasure trove—a gold casket at Long Crendon in Buckinghamshire; sixty-two gold coins found in an earthen jar in a field at Stockerston, Leicestershire; and more than 6,000 silver pennies of the time of Henry III. found at Eccles, near Manchester, and 750 silver coins earthed up near Ayr. In the next autumn year gave their crown a claim to a hundred and eighty silver coins of the reigns of Mary, Elizabeth, James I., and Charles I., found at Grantham; and a gold torque and gold chain brought to light at Castle Hadley, Clare, in Suffolk. The years 1886 and 1887 were marked among other instances by the finding of nearly 7,000 small gold and silver coins at Highbury, near London; eighty guineas concealed in the wall of an old house at East Parley near Christ Church, Hants, and 200 old silver coins in a leaden kitchen pot in other years there were 906 silver coins found at Cuxberford in Staffordshire; and eleven rose nobles found in the cloisters of Westminster Abbey. These several instances of treasure-trove were settled in various ways. Some of the findings were returned by the Crown to the finders, some were sold to the British Museum, in a manner to place an honorarium in the finder's pocket; some were presented to museums, and the money value given to the finders; some are retained by the Crown as antiquarian curiosities, while one has been handed over to the descendants of a former owner.

Seven or eight years ago, two laboring men found a very ancient gold chain, which they sold as a dealer who knew the value better than they did; the unlucky-lucky men fared badly in this instance, seeing that they were punished for selling the "find" without giving notice to the authorities—rather hard lines for rustics, who are most likely to know little about law of treasure-trove. In another case a poor man found a pair of ancient gold armlets, and sold them as old silver bracelets; he sold them as old silver to a silver-smith, who melted them down at once—to the great regret of an antiquary, who would have given much more than their intrinsic value for such relics of former days. During the multifarious digging in which we have been engaged for some years, in and near Cannon street and its neighborhood, for the formation of new streets and the construction of large commercial buildings, the workmen lighted upon twenty-nine guineas and twenty shillings nearly two centuries old; the men got into trouble because they did not voluntarily give them up. On one occasion, when the fusty and musty contents of a rag-dealer's heap were being overhauled, somewhere in the neighborhood of Houndsditch, a diamond ring was espied. A contest arose as to who should possess it; a woman engaged in sorting the rags claimed it because she had found it; the rag dealer disputed her claim; a pawnbroker, who said he had advanced money on the ring, insisted on his prior right; a dealer in old clothes who had sold a garment for that money, and one or two other persons of somewhat doubtful antecedents—all came forward to show that, for some reason or other, the diamond ring ought to be considered theirs. Whether the Crown waived its claim, we are not certain; but a Magistrate eventually gave a decision in favor of the rag-sorter.

Bank-notes, as well as coins, jewelry and articles of the precious metals, sometimes make their appearance among the findings. A bundle of notes was one day placed on outside the counter of a retail shop; the finder claimed them because he was the finder; while the shopkeeper claimed them because it was on his premises that the notes had been dropped. The real owner, whoever he may have been, did not come forward, and the law decided in favor of the finder. But a much more remarkable case occurred here three years ago. A packet containing no less than ten thousand pounds' worth of bank notes was picked up from the pavement in one of the busy streets near the Bank of England, ten notes of one thousand pounds each. A young city clerk picked up and pocketed the treasure. A friend advised him, on consultation, to keep the notes until the following day, when a handsome reward would possibly be offered by the luckless person who had inadvertently dropped the notes. A firm of solicitors, in the name of the real owners, speedily offered one hundred pounds to the finder. The judicious friend consulted the same lawyer, he stipulated that he should have nearly half the sum of one hundred pounds as his reward for the finder's share; and all the time the coaxed sixty pounds out of the owners by a fabricated story concerning himself, the finder and the finding. A Sheriff Court had to decide the matter, and ordered the "friend" to return part, at any rate, of the money he had received.—Chambers' Journal.

Vouching It.

The Americans are accused of spoiling their children by excessive indulgence, and we fear that there is some justice in the charge. Suddenly-acquired wealth, in the vastness of the country, the energy of engenders, is more apt to affect injuriously the offspring of the rich than the rich themselves.

The mere acquisition of a fortune is generally a proof of the possession by him who has accumulated it, at least if he has done so through his own skill and industry, of certain robust qualities of mind or body, which are more or less a protection against some of the obvious influences of wealth. The indigent he must needs have exercised, the energy exerted, and self-denial practiced, and which have become to a great extent habits of life, will surely tend to good him from lapsing into the indolence, apathy and luxurious enjoyment to which the possession of riches often leads. The vices of self-acquired wealth are, for the most part, of a different kind, and may be regarded as merely as the vices qualities displayed in the acquisition, but carried to excess in the possession. The man who has long been the maker of his own fortune will seldom be conscious of any enjoyment it can give beyond the increase of which itself supplies the means. He accordingly, being the same man, with his circumstances, indeed, changed, but only in the sense of increasing his scope, continues the exercise of his habitual propensities. With increased power comes naturally a more imperious application of it, and his early industry, energy and self denial, are apt, so far from abating in the least, to be stimulated into excess, and we often see him in the midst of his superabundance, a mere eager, restless and unemployed being than ever. Self-important, proud and niggardly he will be, perhaps, but there is little chance of his becoming prodigal and lavish of his money. Indeed it is well known that in our large commercial and manufacturing towns the most penurious and sordid misers usually die of money, are those who, having long carry, light fires and cook, like any valet or scullion, or submit to a drubbing if he resists the performance of the lowly work.

It is notorious that the children of American parents residing abroad are quite unable to compete in endurance, not from want of physical vigor, but from the terrible lack of exertion to which they are condemned by the habits of society. Reiring from business at a comparatively early age, as they say he; and he put them in his pocket; and I called to his lordship on the length for a witness and I'm thirty-pands or older dealer closes his shop to day only to take his place in the Exchange or bank to-morrow. Such men are not likely to acquire that zest in lust of which the proverb speaks, and the sole use of it their sons or heirs may perceive in the course of their careless pursuit of wealth.

It is quite otherwise with their offspring, who have never, like their parents who began life in poverty, been subjected to that grinding experience of adversity which swept away all the soft pasts and leaves nothing but the grit of man's nature. Prosperity and luxury, then from the beginning, and guards them carefully from all the rubs of life. It might be supposed that a sire who has accumulated his riches by the hard and long grain of his energies, and clings to them with that bond tenacity characteristic of such, would keep his children the same arul luxury which can only be attained by a more or less free expenditure of his darling money. It is not so, however. It is often observed that even the most avaricious of wealthy men, with all their ordinary prudence, are apt to be extravagant upon their bounty, open it freely to the prodigal demands of their children. The latter are most likely to become acute, alert, law of treasure-trove. In another case a poor man found a pair of ancient gold armlets, and sold them as old silver bracelets; he sold them as old silver to a silver-smith, who melted them down at once—to the great regret of an antiquary, who would have given much more than their intrinsic value for such relics of former days. During the multifarious digging in which we have been engaged for some years, in and near Cannon street and its neighborhood, for the formation of new streets and the construction of large commercial buildings, the workmen lighted upon twenty-nine guineas and twenty shillings nearly two centuries old; the men got into trouble because they did not voluntarily give them up. On one occasion, when the fusty and musty contents of a rag-dealer's heap were being overhauled, somewhere in the neighborhood of Houndsditch, a diamond ring was espied. A contest arose as to who should possess it; a woman engaged in sorting the rags claimed it because she had found it; the rag dealer disputed her claim; a pawnbroker, who said he had advanced money on the ring, insisted on his prior right; a dealer in old clothes who had sold a garment for that money, and one or two other persons of somewhat doubtful antecedents—all came forward to show that, for some reason or other, the diamond ring ought to be considered theirs. Whether the Crown waived its claim, we are not certain; but a Magistrate eventually gave a decision in favor of the rag-sorter.

Bank-notes, as well as coins, jewelry and articles of the precious metals, sometimes make their appearance among the findings. A bundle of notes was one day placed on outside the counter of a retail

How Every Lady May be Her Own Hair-Dresser.

A beautiful head of hair is a woman's crown of glory, but a certain amount of care is needed to keep this crown in order. The finest hair in the world loses its beauty if uncared, and soon becomes frowsy, dry and wiry, and falls out prematurely. Women of wealth have maids whose only fit is to take care of their hair. Others employ hair-dressers, who come at stated times to perform the office, charging from $8 to $10 a month for a daily visit. But the great majority of women have neither maid nor hair-dresser, but attend to their hair themselves, and it is for these we write.

In the care of the hair, the first and most indispensable thing is a good hair brush. This is the best hair tonic in the world, taking the place of all pomades, washes and lotions. It cleanses the head and hair, thus promoting their growth, and is more effectual than the ivory comb, which irritates the scalp and injures the hair. Those who use the ivory comb and hair brush moderately still brushes or better still a stiff one for cleansing the hair and a soft one for smoothing it. Brush your hair vigorously in morning and night, or get some one to do it for you if you can. A half-hour's brushing is not too much for a liberal allowance, and as these can be given by an expert in three minutes, it will not require much time. Once or twice a week and you will find your hair become as silky and glossy as satin, without the use of any of the many hair washes which no lady of refinement will tolerate.

If your hair is moist, or matted, it is well to rub into the roots a little bay-rum or rum-starch, and afterward brush it out till the glossy condition is reached. Many use a tendency to dry up the natural oil of the hair. It should be used only when the hair is thin and short enough to fly immediately. Long, thick hair that is often wet soon becomes musty and disagreeable. The best method of shampooing is to rub the head well with the yolks of one or two eggs, slightly beaten, and afterward with a little water, thus producing a fine lather. When the head is thoroughly cleansed, rinse it with cold water, and dry with a soft towel, as much as possible. If not susceptible to cold, spread out the tresses in a current of air, and dry them quickly. Then comb and brush out the hair, and a fine dressing, mixed with glycerine. A professional hair-dresser charges one dollar for shampooing the head.

Next to the constant use of the brush, we recommend the frequent trimming of the ends of the hair, not merely of the long ends, but of the broken and jagged ends that are about the roots of the head. It were. This can be easily done by parting the hair in small locks, then letting the long ends hang over the front of the teeth of a dressing comb, and clipping off the forked ends as they appear above the comb. Ladies who have their hair cut in this manner should have it done by a member of the French Academy predicted a sure fortune to any one who would invent a lotion which would banish the hair of two juvenile professors. But those who will use such dyes should be told that the only safe ones are based on sugar of lead or some other harmless ingredient. For instance, a pint of alcohol, a pint of rosewater, four ounces of the fluid extract of logwood, four ounces of the tincture of iron, and four ounces of the spirit of ammonia, make a harmless and effectual dye for those who think they cannot dispense with it.

It is a disputed question whether children's hair should be kept cropped. There is no doubt that its fineness and softness are lessened by cutting. The Greeks, those apostles of beauty, never permitted the razor to touch the boards of their men or the scissors the hair of their women; and some physicians affirm that men become bald oftener than women because their hair is stimulated to waste its vitality by more frequent cutting. On the other hand, girls' hair doubtless gains in thickness and strength by being cut occasionally, even when not kept short. When doctors differ, who shall decide?—N. Y. Express.

The Unhappiness of Childhood.

There is a common way of talking of the period of childhood as if it were one of perpetual happiness. Grown-up people are so far removed from their early days, that, in many cases, they seem to forget what they endured as children. They think of themselves as having been happy, strong, free from care, light-hearted—at least, in contrast with the various troubles and ills which thought in which they now find themselves, it seems as if they had been so; and they speak of happy childhood as if nearly all persons were the normal condition of human beings in the early stages of their existence.

It is probable that there are some persons who can look back upon an unintrospectively happy childhood, and, when that is the case, they have reason to be assured up which are, indeed, priceless in value. But it is true, in far more cases than they suppose, that childhood is a period in which there is very little of positive happiness, and very much of actual suffering and unhappiness. Not only are there the small griefs incident to the discipline necessary for childhood—the petty disappointments which seem so keen, the small self-denials which appear so great, the restraints as to the exercise of will which the necessary rule of home or school imposes—but there are far keener sufferings than these. There are the cases of children whose whole life is one of suffering, of actual or impending illness, who may, perhaps, by reason of it, grow prone to be men and women in tolerable health, but who never can look back on a time when they were not familiar with pain, and dread and well.

People are apt to think that such children as these have their compensations in extra care and love given to them; but let any one who has had experience of such a childhood look back to it, and say if the unhappiness of illness did not greatly overbalance all that could be the unhappiness of misunderstood and misunderstood children. There are children of peculiar temperaments, whose whole lives are rendered a burden to them by the fact that the persons set over them—either parents, guardians or teachers—have been destitute of sympathy for them, and have not thought it worth while to try what a chance a little kindness would do for them. Harriet Martineau and the young Brontes seem to have been children of unusually sensitive natures, and their natures struggled through into brighter lives yet there are hundreds may thousands, of children, in city, town and country, who have as thousands of men fighting their battle of life, and, probably, more dogged, obstinate, and trusted with harshness, who live lives of dull wretchedness because they are not understood, and are treated with the same discipline as if they were the children of a wealthy system will supply oil enough if the head is kept clean. There may be little, if any, use or unnatural dryness of scalp and lushness of hair. A mixture of half an ounce of defibrene and ammonia to a pint of sweet oil will remedy this. When the hair is falling out, the following is the best dressing: Mix a pint of alcohol, a pint of rose-water, a fluid ounce of vaseline and an ounce of pure quinine in powder, and two scruples of tartaric acid, and apply as a wash every other day until the hair stops falling. Avoid all nostrums, especially such as contain mercury, sulphur or cantharides, which are positively dangerous.

The hair being nicely brushed and in order, the next thing is to be put it up in the most becoming fashion. To do this it is necessary to study one's face, and adopt the prevailing style so it as far as possible. If the face is short the hair should be rolled back from the forehead and dressed high on the top and in the back. A long face, on the contrary, is shortened by arranging the hair in flat bands over the forehead and low down on the back. A fine, full, round face requires a compromise between the two styles. Avoid all nonsense in dressing the hair; wear it

LOOK THIS WAY!!

Charlevoix the Acme of the Pleasure Seekers Joy.

Although the subject of this article is time worn with us and our readers, it is a topic rich in subject matter, and one which professes an ample fund of argument.

Since the railroad has furnished quick transit to the cool breezes of the lakes only very little has seemed to prevail among the class of people who profit by the circumstance—and that has been to reach a spot where the malaria could not associate nor the suffocating atmosphere render their summer days miserable and comfortless. This necessity has been the Ely-a sojourn on the shores of Lottie Traverse Bay or at Mackinac.

It has been said to me what particular disease fuel antidotes in this climate. We will not attempt to answer this question spiritually. We know, and hundreds will bear us witness, that this climate will make a well man better, and upon this hypothesis we must reason that an invalid must improve under the same influences. Our cool breezes and our beautiful water are arguments of themselves. The healthfulness of this climate is proverbial.

But we desire to point to Charlevoix as a point peculiarly fitted by nature to meet not only the necessities of health, but of pleasure. The spirits of the sick must be buoyed by healthful sports, as well as their systems invigorated by pure air. We have been asked if the stories of trout catching in this region are 'fish stories" or facts, and we answer by stating that it is not uncommon for parties of two and four to "kil," from five to twelve hundred trout in a sojourn of three days upon the Jordan River. We can give instances, names and proof if called upon. This stream is pronounced by competent judges as the best trout stream in America! This is but a pleasant steamboat ride of less than two hours from Charlevoix. Numerous streams of less notoriety are near Charlevoix, which abound in the speckled beauties.

The existence of our beautiful crystal lakes will suggest many other pleasures which it is unnecessary for us to enumerate here. We assert that in no place in this broad country can the summer months be spent more pleasantly and healthfully than here.

Our mail and telegraph facilities are ample, and our routes of travel are numerous and convenient. Two local steamers give us quick transit to the mainland, in as many directions, and two large lake steamers give quick and pleasant trip by lake to Chicago or Buffalo and their intermediate ports.

In conclusion we challenge comparison with the resorts of America in the points we have mentioned, and feel confident that it will overstep many resorts that now claim prestige.

COLLISION.—The schooner Fleetwing, of this port, collided with the large schooner Milwaukee Belle, on Wisconsin shore, one morning last week. The Fleetwing had her foremast carried away, pilothouse displaced, and bulwarks broken in on one bow. The other schooner towed her into Mud Creek, where she shipped a new foremast. She is now in this port making repairs.

A Tourist.

"You have a fine city here," remarked Oscar Dusk, as he stood before the desk and rubbed his hands.

The Court looked down on him in silence.

"Such broad streets, such big dogs, such beautiful alleys, such nice hand organs I never saw in a town before," continued the man.

That same cold, murderous look from the Court.

"I'm almost tempted to spend the remainder of my days here," said the prisoner. "The water agrees with me, the air seems very pure, and I find that the Detroit quart of peanuts is bigger than any other in the land."

Still no word from his Honor. His eyes glistened like the tines of a pitchfork in the hay-field, but he was lidding his time.

"I'm much obliged to the boys for helping me in here last night," coolly continued the man. "I am subject to those attacks of vertigo, and Providence seems to raise up friends for me at the perilous moment. I'll leave a quarter for the man who lifted me up and begged of me not to die."

While he was feeling for the clinker the Court was calling round how the tourist broke two chairs in a saloon, had a fight with a hackman and hid himself in a lumber pile, and wrote out on a piece of paper at full length that familiar old saying. "Twenty dollars or three months," and held it up to view.

The tourist looked at the words. Then he looked at the clock. Then he glanced out upon the green grass in the alley and saw the lambs gallopling up and down in playful mood.

"Your complaint—I'll lend you twenty dollars," he finally sighed.

"And don't have any more vertigo in this city," said the Court. Vertigo makes the money go, you observe."

"I believe you think I was drunk," complained the tourist.

"Vum," replied the Court, bowing profoundly.

"And you don't make any difference between vertigo and drunkenness?"

"Not a bit."

The man walked out doors and headed for the nearest saloon. He was going in for the first thing, with vertigo counted out.—Detroit Free Press.

THE SENTINEL.

WILLARD A. SMITH, Editor and Proprietor.

CHARLEVOIX, - - MICHIGAN.

HENNINGTON.

The following poem, by Wm Mullen Bryant, was read at the recent celebration of the hundredth anniversary of the battle of Bennington:

On this fair valley's verdant breast
The rains sweet rays of summer rest,
And there like peace herself, by breeze
On its smooth lawns and sunbeam woods.

A century since, in flame and smoke,
The storm of battle over it broke,
And, o'er the border turned and fled,
There pleasant fields were strewn with dead.

Stark, quick to act and bold to dare,
And Warner's stubborn heart were there,
And Allen, who laid flung the sea
Aside to lead the Berkshire men.

With fiery onset, blow for blow,
They rushed upon the enchanted foe,
And swept his scanty columns from the vale
Like leaves before the autumn gale.

Oh! never may the purple stain
Of conquer'd blood these fields again,
Nor the fair valley's sky cease
To wear the placid smile of peace.

Yet here from all the battle field
We plight the vow that, ere we yield
The rights for which our fathers bled,
Our blood shall steep the sod we tread.

BLACK EAGLE'S LAST RACE.

"When Mars Dick—dat's your uncle, chillyens—was a young man, he was a leadin' sport, he was. He cut a big swath, he did. He was de prettiest son. 'You've got de hurricane jaf, Robert,' he says—your father, he was called Bob, but I'se de practical son. 'I'se lef' myself only an empty pocket an' dese two ole salvants. Will yer gib 'em shelter till dey die, in 'membrance ob de times?' Dem salvants war dat hoss in de stall yonder—dat great racer, Black Eagle, sir,—me." And the speaker gave emphasis to his remark by a lordly wave of his hand over his skinny little figure, as he sat perched on the top of a barrel.

"Yis, sah! Dat war jes' like yer Uncle Dick—allers free-handed—gibbin' de right han' an' de lef' de mos' valoodiest things he owned! Dah he is now, in dem far-off hoss's abidin' wid Kings an' a-waltzin' wid Princesses—de Furlongs allers kep' de best ob company—an neber nigger ob his own to hoss his shoes. How's dey to know he's de owner on dat great hoss, Black Eagle, sah, or ob me? Yar fader, Ac's got me. He allers had de pick an' de choose, Mars Robert did."

The Furlong boys did not relish this everlasting reference to Point. They had a pretty clear idea of the true story of Uncle Dick. Boys always do catch glimpses of the family skeletons, on account of their tightly the closet doors are locked.

They suspected that it was on races to all the Dick Points in this way, how much "go" there is in 'em. Often the bony old beast and ugly, chubby Dick, would be found lying there together upon the grass, fast asleep. Point delighted with the boy because of his friendship for the horse.

"Re am got de right name! He's got his uncle's blood. He knows de hosses, and de hosses knows him, at fus' sight!"

But Dick, unfortunately, was not an influential friend. Mr Furlong left the affairs of the one to another, who moved in a circle of which Dick was not included. Such fault-finding as there was with Point would come from his boon companions, or, as Point said, "dem low-bred Cornhill ponies."

Dick grinned with delight. Sucking tore his head, and he was amazed at the thumped, flicked and struck him with the stick, but Black Eagle would not move a leg to faster. He jogged on slowly as any obstinate donkey. He knew what was good for Dick quite as well as did the horse-jockey, and he was now searching the house for the young regue.

Dick continued his parsuay for at least half an hour, and then gave it up. Away from home, in a lonely road which wound up the South Mountain. His ride had been a long and wearisome one, and he was really feeling hungry. Looking around, he caught sight of some bushes such as he had found blackberries on in the months before. The snow did not look very promising for chinquapins, nor was he quite sure it was the season for them; but the thought might be worth while to look at these bushes more closely.

Black Eagle, poor horse—easily enough—but the trouble was, that he could not stop sliding. The ground was covered with a thin coat of frozen snow. On the right, the hill rose, thickly wooded. Upon the left was a perpendicular precipice of fifty feet, with a creek at the bottom, which was covered with thin ice. The bushes grew along the edge of this precipice, letting it from sight. It was to them that poor little Dick had turned.

The horse stood were the child had left him, shivering as though he had no sap, and thinking, moreover, that even the cold stable was a comfortable place compared with this bleak hillside.

Suddenly, he heard a crash among the frozen bushes, and a cry. Then he looked back at his master, and saw that he was not there. He started on a run—a jog-trot, at least—but the ice was too slippery for that. He could not support him many minutes below was a sheer descent into the frozen creek.

Black Eagle, with his fore feet planted on the edge of the cliff, tried to reach Dick with his teeth. The old fellow stretched his neck to the utmost, but could not reach the boy by at least three feet. He tried again, and then, drawing up his hands to grasp his manes it hung down, but could not reach it.

Then the old racer turned and seemed to measure with his eyes the distance between him and home. He looked at Dick, telling him—in his way, I have no doubt—to hold on until he could come back, and the next moment, the long beard the boy had grown on the jaggy knees of frozen road.

Dick called after him after him, but as he raised his head, the slight motion made his head ache, and he sank down again, and slowly down the hill.

But this did not suit Master Dick. He tugged at the reins, shouted, and, finally, brought a branch from a thorn-bush that was near at hand, he laid it on to the poor old hide. The horse quickened his pace, but only for a few moments, and then he lagged behind.

Dick grew quite angry. Shaking the branch, he struck the horse on the back, he thumped, flicked and struck him with the stick, but Black Eagle would not move a leg the faster. He jogged on slowly as any obstinate donkey. He knew what was good for Dick quite as well as did the horse-jockey, and he was now searching the house for the young regue.

OUR RADIX LETTER.

Hartford Sept. 10, 1877

Well, in spite of my recent promise to play truant no more I find myself again away from that hurly-burly and surrounded by the (to me) novel attractions of this venerable but lovely and vigorous little city. And a very interesting spot it is, from whatever standpoint it be regarded. There is nothing else in the Nutmeg State or out of it so the greensward greener or the shade of the grand old trees more grateful. In few other American cities are pressing evidences of wealth and culture more plentiful. With hardly another is there more of historic interest associated while as a precinct center I don't know there is another town of equal size on the globe that can compare with her—a fact of which her citizens seem justly proud. In fact if the average Hartfordite has one prominent amiable weakness it is for impressing outsiders with the solidity and magnitude of his city's financial operations. To this end statistics are kept lying around loose in order that even the most transient visitor need not depart in ignorance of the wealth of Connecticut capital. Nor can it be denied that these statistics justify the prominence given them. For example I had not been an hour in town before I staggered under the knowledge that this little city of 50,000 inhabitants is worth in real and personal property considerably upwards of two hundred millions of dollars. It is not an every day affair for a New Yorker to feel like taking a back seat on questions of material prosperity, but here there is no escape for him; for, torture the figures as we will, they still leave Manhattan way behind. New York with twenty times the population has only five times the valuation of Hartford.

These figures must seem of doubtful credibility to anyone who forgets Hartford's position as the insurance center of America. Over one half the enormous property represented by the numbers above quoted belongs to the fifteen or twenty companies having their home in this favored spot. Everybody knows more or less about the Hartford companies, but everybody does not know perhaps that the amount which they now have at risk on buildings and lives is a billion and a half of dollars, or more than the total estimated value of New York city. American Fire Insurance may almost be said to have been born here, the history of at least two of its still flourishing companies dating back to the first years of this century, and here it has seemed to thrive more than elsewhere. Life insurance to the attained a wonderful growth, and with the exception of the late unfortunate trouble with the Charter Oak, Hartford Companies have stood the shrinkage in values and general depression of business, probably better than any similar institution in the country. Want of confidence in life insurance is not so manifest in Hartford as in cities more remote from the Home Offices.

In this connection we are pleased to note a few facts respecting the Ætna Life Insurance Co., of which the people of this city may well feel proud. Its name is a tower of strength, and its solvency has never been questioned. With twenty seven years of successful and uniformly progressive business, with conservative management and judicious investments which have characterized the history of the Company, its patrons may feel assured their interests are well protected. The President T. O. Enders, has been identified with the Company twenty-four years. With his executive ability and untiring efforts, and the co operation of an efficient and honorable board of directors the company has a guarantee of a successful future.

The Ætna embraces both the "stock" and "mutual" plans of doing business. Let us now look at the Connecticut Mutual, an institution operating purely on the latter basis, and see whether or no the public may feel safe in putting premiums into its hands. Here is another company, which was born during the infancy of life underwriting in this country; and after thirty years of business during which it has grown to be the second life company in the world in point of size, it can make the rare boast that the finger of suspicion has never

The Night After Plevna—A Terrible Scene.

The correspondent of the London Daily News writes from Bucharest, Aug. 5, descriptive of the sad scenes which followed the defeat of the Russians at Plevna:

The day was fast receding into one of the bloodiest battle-fields of the century—closing in round the batteries whose guns were still firing, round bleached parties of Russian soldiers who were doggedly maintaining the fight against the swarms of Turks who formed a ring around them, firing fiercely into their midst, round the dead and the wounded lying thick on the stubbles, on the grassy slopes, in the hollows among the maize plants and cool copses, round the knots of wounded who had crawled for cover to the inside of the grain stacks on the fields, and who lay there in the unspeakable agony of waiting for the inevitable doom which they knew too well was to befall them, round the groups of nineteen tramps from about the battle-field intent on wreaking that doom on the defenceless wounded, and stopping over and over again to perpetrate some barbarity. Prince Schaikoskoy and his staff stood on the summit of the rhize above the Village of Radisovo, which was crammed with wounded men. The fate of the battle had hung in the scale for some time, but now all hope of success had gone. There was no reserve among us in the acknowledgment that the attack had been a failure—all the regiments now to do on what was possible toward diminishing the results of that failure. There was no conversation; men's heads were too heavy for talk. We sat about on the knoll, gazing down into the pandemonium below.

The General, alone and apart, paced up and down a little open space in the oak copse, gloom settled on his face. All around us the air was heavy with the low moaning of the wounded who, having limped or been aided thus far out of the fight, had cast themselves down to gain a little relief from the agony of motion. There was not even water for them, for Radisovo is all but a waterless village, and what water trickled in the tiny rill from the fountain behind the village was snatched for eagerly by the parched and fevered wounded who crowded around it, coveting with a longing, the agony of which the reader can never know, a few drops of the precious fluid. I cannot tell when I most respect and admire the splendid, honest Russian soldier—whether when he is plodding along without a murmur vert after vent, under a burden just double in weight that which our soldiers carry, cheering the way as he tramps with a lusty chorus, or when, with cheers that ring with sincerity, and with an alacrity which is genuine, he presses forward into the battle; and when he is standing stubbornly confronting his enemy, conscious of being overmatched, yet never dreaming of running away; or when he is lying wounded but uncomplaining, helping his neighbor in the same plight with some trifling act of kindly assistance, and waiting for what God and the Czar shall send him, with a patient, unmurmuring calm that is surely true heroism.

The darkness closed in around us, and the enemy seemed bent on following the example of the Russians. We had been on this ridge for a long time beyond the range of the enemy's batteries; but now these were advancing, and were in action more under fire. Through the darkness we could see the flashes of the cannon—they must be back now in the position on the knoll below the position where four hours ago the Russian soldiers had charged them with the bayonet, and whence two hours ago the Russian cannon had been firing. A second move, and nearer and nearer came the whistle of the shells, with a swiftly gradual crescendo into a scream as they sped over, as and crashed down into the village in the valley behind us; and yet nearer there was the flashing of the musketry fire in the darkness, one could watch the streaks of flame foreshortened down in the valley there, and nerves trained by a long day of restlessness, excitement, fatigue and exposure to sun, and the chances of the battle-field, quivered under the prolonged tension of endurance, as the throbbing hum of the bullet sped through or over the straggling group. No man dared to say to that stern, lowering Chief, eating his heart there in the bitterness of his disappointment, that it was a bootless hurrying of forces to linger longer on this exposed spot, nor did any man care to quit for the sake of proper safety the companionship which had endured throughout the day. So we lingered on till our senses became dulled, and we sank down at last into slumber, regardless of the scream of the shells and the hum of the bullets. It was a unique object which so long detained the General in a position so exposed. There was no force available to line the height and cover to form a little extent the wounded lying on and behind it from the Bashi-Bazouks, who, too certainly, were prowling in the vicinity, and ever coming nearer and nearer. An attempt had, indeed, been made to get together a detachment of infantry for this purpose, and a bugler, at the General's order, persistently sounded the assembly, but the result was merely to gather a handful of stragglers from half a dozen different regiments, and although but a company was wanted, that trivial strength could not be collected, so the General, his staff and his escort took up for the time a kind of informal post duty, and there we waited till the pale, calm moon rose and poured the sheen of her soft radiance over the battle-field. While it was yet dark there had been no cessation of the firing both artillery and musketry, and now that Heaven was bidding a cassile to Hades, the fire waxed warmer and bitter. Up from out of it, with broken tramp, came a detachment, silent, jaded, powder-grimed. There could not have been a company all told; a Lieutenant marched at its head, and it was the remnant, so far as could be gathered, the sole remnant, of one of the battalions of one of the many second division, that had crossed the ridge over which its debris was now listlessly trailing itself, three fine battalions strong.

At last the jingle of cavalry accouterments was heard, and a squadron of dragoons rode on to the heights and, extending in skirmishing order, relieved the headquarters staff. It was a poor screen to interpose between a victorious and ferocious army and a mass of wounded men; but nothing more was available. The General had lost an army, the fragments of an army had lost their General. We turned the heads of our jaded horses, and, silent and depressed, rode down the slope across the valley and up the slope beyond. Our pace was a slow walk, for there were wounded men everywhere, limping along the narrow path in front of us, prostrate on the grass by the side of it, or asleep in the very dust. Occasionally we struck detachments of infantry who had scrambled back out of the fight and were lying on their arms in utter ignorance of the best direction in which to march. Or it might be a battery of artillery, halted in perplexing dubiety whether if they went on they might march into the bosom of the Turkish Army. I believe there existed some intention that we should go for the night to a village called Bogot. But we got confused as to the road, and bewildered by the crackling spurts of infantry fire that broke out in the moonlight in the most fortable fashion. Were the Turks then wholly round us, that we heard, and seemingly felt, fire as it seemed to north, to south, to east and to west? Once such was the confusion that we were forced upon by a detachment of Russian troops, halted in equal bewilderment with ourselves, and expecting an enemy from any or every side.

We made halt after halt, but there never was rest for us. A spurt of news, a word or two from one or a Cossack would ride in with intelligence that the Bashi-Bazouks were prowling near by, and there was a hurried move forward there yet lingered with the most sanguine of us the idea that the battle would be resumed next morning, we sounding as artillery support to the supposedly fresh troops of Krudener. Where, I asked myself, is our artillery to take orders for such a purpose? We did not know where we were ourselves, much less where the army was, of which the groping, forlorn, dejected band were the headquarters. Of Krudener's experiences we knew as little as we knew simply nothing. It was useless to dispatch aides-de-camp or orderlies without being able to give them a direction in which to ride. All we knew was that there were wounded men about us, and that we and our horses were dead beat.

Nature will assert herself. About one o'clock in the morning we threw some branches on the embers of the berky to-bacco-pipes, shook some shower cut as fodder for our horses, and other cut for ourselves, and, throwing ourselves down, fell into dead slumber. But there was no long rest for us. At three o'clock we were aroused by the tidings that the Bashi-Bazouks were close to us, and the fine, manly mould of the answer to that statement. We huddled a number of wounded into and upon some carts which came up casually, and started them off, whether in the right direction or not we had no conception. Ugh, how miserably raw and chill struck the bleak morning air before the dawn! But if the rawness of the air struck to our marrow, hale and sound as we were, what must have been the sufferings of the poor wounded, weak from loss of blood, fallin in the grass, and soaked which follows, so inevitably, the night dew of August? Some were shivering on the ground in their blood-clotted clothes! Yet happy were they, pitiable as was their plight, in comparison with those who had been left behind in the battle-field and had been left behind in Rudlovo. The tale of the former we know from what we have seen ourselves seen; of the latter, it was told to us by scared messengers that the Bashi-Bazouks had, in the dead of night, worked round our left flank, and had fallen upon them and butchered them in their beplessness.

Schipka Pass.

A correspondent, an eye-witness of the battle in Schipka Pass, telegraphs on the 20th, while riding forward from Schipka through the night. I passed masses of reinforcements, artillery and infantry, hurrying forward. Their presence ought to secure the safety of all the important positions. The same correspondent telegraphs from Bucharest, on the 20th: Information follows me that fighting at the Pass is still raging, having been so in progress to-day; but Raieoff's troops continues to hold his own. It is now a question of endurance. But I adhere to my impression that Schipka Pass being the famous Suleiman Pasha was run the column through another pass he will wreck his army by useless dashing if continually against Schipka. The correspondent adds that Schipka Pass consists merely of a section of the Balkans, lower than the surrounding heights. There is no room properly to extend but merely a track over the lower section of ridge which is extremely broken and hilly. The highest point of the road is flanked on either side by a sore commanding heights and also a ridge behind the first of these two spurs can rake the road leading to the Russian positions. During the spurs break off abruptly and precipitously, affording no access to the valley north of the Balkans. Their sole access to the Turks was the defiling of positions from whence to flank the central Schipka Ridge. It is possible also for troops to descend from these struggle through the intervening glens, and, climbing the steep slopes of Schipka Ridge, give back to each other or reach the road which runs along its summit. This done, the Schipka position would, of course, be turned, but the advantage would be of little avail till the road had been opened by carrying the fortified positions on it. The road over Schipka Ridge constitutes, for an army, the only practicable line of communication in this section of the Balkans.

On the 21st, when the fighting began, Suleiman Pasha was a little over a mile strong, with forty cannon. The Russians on this day had nines in front of their trenches, which were exploded by means of an electric battery. Second division, this had crossed the ridge over which its debris was now listlessly trailing itself, three fine battalions strong.

An American Circus in Brittany.

To-day the Bretons are very much what they were a century ago—yes, more than that—perhaps two or three centuries ago. They are superstitious, bigoted and ignorant. They come to the markets clad in skins in winter and in sackcloth in summer. They cultivate the soil in the rudest manner with wooden plows, and are content in all the ways of life to live as their fathers lived.

We often hear of the sun standing in the skies of the father, and this may be said literally of the Bretons. It often happens that a pair of leather shoes is handed down from father to son. These shoes last a long time, for they are only used on rare occasions, ride wooden shoes, or sabots, being commonly worn. Not one in ten of the grown people can read and write, and newspapers are a luxury enjoyed only by the rich. The people are simple-minded and credulous, but in money matters they are not too simple to make exceedingly shrewd bargains.

Now, in a country like this, in a town like this quaint, old-fogyish Quimperle, just fancy an American circus making its appearance. Here, in the public square, a tremendous yellow-and red poster has been displayed for a week past, and crowds of admiring peasants, more picturesque than tidy, have stood before it in admiring wonder from morning till night. In long trains of unridden horses, in lumpbacked camels and bulky elephants, have been commented upon until their minutest points are known to every peasant within ten miles. A commotion was created one day by a cyclist of one-eyed beggar declaring that the proprietors of the circus were emissaries of the Prussian Government, and from that suspicion to the belief that they were secretly fortifying the town preparatory to the attack was but a single step. Finally, when the day arrived for the grand entrance in the painted cavalcade was Prince Bismarck, although the bill announced, in plain English, that it was the Anglo-American circus that was coming. The people evidently quite take in the word Anglo; but American was plain to each of them as could read French on account of its similarity to the same word in that language.

As the writer was known to be an American, he was called on many times to give explanations of the figures on the bill; and many conversations regarding these pictures would have grown doubt at once on his nationality. Was that like an American elephant? Does Mr. Barnum patronize the United States ride in a coach like that?—pointing to the musician's car. How many camels could a good sportsman shoot in a day in America? Do all the people in America wear feathers like that red Indian on the bill?

All these questions, and many more, were continually put and faithfully answered.

At last the circus came. Relight and early on that wonderful morning all Quimperle was up and astir. Even the best clothes to see the grand entry of the circus. Tramp, tramp, tramp into the town, from all quarters, the people came, and the sabots clattered in one direction toward the great square, where huge hauling wagons were being unloaded. Such a thing as a French clown is all but an impossibility and it seems almost equally impossible for an English clown to learn French. So two Americans and English gathered there were obliged to explain the jokes over and over again for the benefit of our Quimperle friends, who laughed, but did not understand. But we did it all very willingly, for we were patriotic enough to wish the best impression should be it by the American circus in Brittany.—Wm. F. Bound, in St. Nicholas for September.

Astounding Precocity.

Among the notable human curiosities which are constantly being picked up by the police in their rounds on the outskirts of society is little Mary Fagan. She is a wonderfully precocious child of seven years. The police found her one day wandering as if she were innocently lost in the streets of New York though she looked prosperous and cunning beyond her years, but even he, who imagined he knew every trick of the street Arab, was thrown off his guard and laid by the heels that he had not an inkling of the rascality that was ripening in that child's mind. The child was taken to the station house, did great damage to the crops, and in a single day ruined the broad plain back of the city but as ingenuous as ever. The water was only kept from flowing into the city by an embankment outside the walls, which in many places was out of repair. Great fear was felt of such an inundation as occurred in 1861—the year of the plague—when 1,000 persons died in two months, at last broke through the dikes some ten miles above the city, and the torrent swooping down with irresistible force

THE SENTINEL.

WILLARD A. SMITH, Editor and Proprietor.

CHARLEVOIX, - - MICHIGAN.

General News Summary.

FOREIGN.

According to a London dispatch of the 29th, the war had already cost Russia 800,000,000 roubles.

THE Porte has directed the concentration of an army of 20,000 men at Timok, on the Servian frontier, and it threatens the deposition of Prince Milan if Servia begins war.

THE editor of the Madras Times, under date Aug. 1, writes that 583,000 persons had already died in that town in India from starvation, and that one-sixth of the entire population would die.

DR. LLOYD, one of the largest merchants in Rome, Italy, has failed for $400,000, and absconded.

A PERA dispatch of the 31st ult. says an English publication, just returned from Sofiyka, says the loss on both sides from the Turkish assaults upon Plevna would exceed 20,000 in killed and wounded, and that the dead outnumbered the wounded. Up to that time the allied garrison had suffered substantial advantage from the tremendous sacrifice.

THE British Consul at Belgrade has remonstrated with the Prince of Servia on the warlike attitude, declaring that, if the Servians be defeated, the Principality would be abandoned to the discretion of Turkey.

ON the 31st ult., Gambetta appeared before the Civil Tribunal of the Seine, to answer to the charge of "assuming the Power to Dout and Cabinet, and exciting hatred between citizens."

THE Journal des Alpes, a French newspaper, has been summoned before the Correctional Tribunal, for publishing an insulting remark relative to Gen. Grant. The Freedom of the City of Geneva was presented to the latter on the 31st ult.

SHUMLA telegrams of the 31st ult. announce that the Turks were assuming the offensive along the whole line. They had crossed the Rorer Lom, and, after a brisk engagement, lasting nine hours, driven the Russians from their fortified camp. The Turks admit a loss of 3,000 men, and claim that the Russians lost 4,000.

PRINCE CHARLES, of Roumania, has assumed command of the united Russian and Roumanian Armies, compelling the western detachment.

AN EREZROUM telegram of the 31st ult. says the Russian army changed front and were then between the Turkish Armies and Adrianople.

CONSTANTINOPLE dispatches of the 31st ult. say the Turks were making supreme efforts to increase their fighting forces, and were quietly, but swiftly, putting every man capable of bearing arms into the army.

DURING the recent engagement on the Lom, Col. Valentin Baker, the British officer who recently served a term in prison for an assault upon a young lady in a railway carriage, commanded the Turkish cavalry, and is reported to have behaved in a dashing. Shot the battle he has disappeared, and it was believed, on the 3d, that he had been killed.

OCT. 14 has been fixed upon as the date of the French election.

THE Russians evacuated Selvion the 3d.

THE Turkish Government has ordered that the fortifications around Adrianople, consisting of two detached forts, be completed before cold weather.

LONDON dispatches of the 3d say the Turks acknowledged the loss of 7,000 men in their recent assault upon Schipka. It was stated that Suleiman Pasha had abandoned all efforts for its recapture.

PRINCE CHARLES, of Roumania, has assumed supreme command of the united Russian and Roumanian Armies before Plevna.

THE Turks evacuated Sukum-Kaleh, on the Black Sea, on the 3d.

EX-PRESIDENT THIERS died quite suddenly, at his residence near Paris, on the evening of the 3d.

DOMESTIC.

THE Illinois State Savings Institution, at Chicago, suspended on the 28th, an assignment of the bank being made to Cashier Abner Taylor. The liability is about 14,000 depositors as nearly $6,000,000, and the assets are said to be composed of worthless savings, although on the face they nearly equal the liabilities. A statement of the condition of the affairs of the bank would be made as soon as an examination could be had.

A WASHINGTON dispatch of the 29th says: Terry having brought information that Forrest, all, with 200 warriors, was in camp this side of the 31st inst., all proceedings in regard to [illegible] Commission to arrange for his return to the United States had been suspended for the present.

A TERRIBLE accident occurred on the Chicago, Rock Island & Pacific Railroad, about seven miles from Des Moines, on the morning of the 28th, by which several lives were lost, and many other persons received serious injuries. A sudden rise in the east branch of Two Mile Creek had, it seems, undermined the foundations of the railroad bridge over that stream, and a portion of the structure had given way during the night, leaving the track suspended. The west-bound express train came along about half-past two in the morning and passed on to the ice colored, where the wreck of Barnum's advertising car, the baggage, mail and three passenger cars went into the stream, a distance down of twenty feet, and were almost completely demolished. The scene at the time of the accident is said to have been terrific, the rain falling in torrents, accompanied by wind, lightning and thunder. Up to the night of the 29th, eighteen dead bodies had been taken from the wreck, and forty or fifty other persons were seriously or slightly injured.

THE Chicago Inter-State Exposition was formally opened, on the evening of the 30th.

THE eight men condemned to from two to four months' imprisonment and a fine of fifty dollars each for interfering with the execution of the Toledo, Peoria & Warsaw Railroad, were discharged from further durance by Judge Drummond, at Chicago, on the 30th ult., on entering into bonds to keep the peace for one year.

THE excitement in Chicago caused by the failure of the State Savings Institution continued on the 30th ult., large numbers of depositors congregating on the street in front of the bank building, and freely commenting on the outrageous swindle which had been perpetrated upon them, and showing by their words and manner that, if they could have got hold of the absconding President, Spencer, or Cashier, Guild, they would have dealt with them in a summary manner. Some of the scenes and incidents among the impoverished patrons of the defunct institution are described as being pathetic and affecting in the extreme. Very many, including washerwomen and laboring men with large families, had deposited their small earnings, during years of hard labor and close economy, in the bank, having implicit faith in its solvency, only to find, as the truth leaks out, that they have been systematically and unscrupulously robbed of the fruits of their toil and privations, and that, too, at a time, when they need it most for the support of selves and families. The threatenings of Socialism and Communism assumed a mystery, and Buckley, the Assistant Cashier, who had much to do with the management of the bank, had also failed to put in appearance, and could not be found. They have doubtless left for parts unknown. The investigation into the bank affairs had so far developed evidence of deliberate swindling on the part of the management. What percentage would be realized by depositors was still, on the 30th, a matter of conjecture, but it would be small, indeed. The daily papers of the city are very severe in their strictures upon the management of the bank, and especially upon the absconding cashier, who seem to have deliberately laid their plans to leave the city before the mast crash came. Runs were taking place on other savings banks in the city, but confidence seemed to be felt, in business circles, that no further failures would take place.

A WASHINGTON special of the 31st ult. says that Secty McCrary and others at the War Department did not believe the report that Sitting Bull had left Canada and was advancing to meet Chief Joseph. Neither Gen. Sherman nor Gen. Sheridan placed faith in the statements of Gen. Miles' scout, and were of the opinion that the rumors in regard to Sitting Bull's return may have been based upon the movements of a small band of his warriors.

TEN blocks of business houses and dwellings in Paris, Tex., were destroyed by fire on the 30th ult. Three hotels, the Postoffice, telegraph and express offices were among the buildings burned. Many families were rendered homeless. Several lives were reported lost, but only one body had been found. Loss estimated at $1,000,000 to $1,250,000. It is said that a man named Taylor started the fire by pouring oil on the floor of a saloon and lighting it, remarking that he would burn the town. He was arrested and lodged in jail.

AMONG the failures at the East, announced on the 2d, were those of the Bandwich Savings Bank, of Boston—deposits $1,100,000; a metal broker of New York City—liabilities, $120,000, assets, $50,000; and T. E. Field, banker, of Frankfort, Me.—liabilities estimated at $1,100,000.

DURING August the National Bank currency was increased by an additional issue of $1,301,640, and the outstanding legal tender aggregate reduced to $356,052,998.

A FIRE broke out in the piano factory of J. P. Hale, on West Thirty-fifth street, New York City, on the morning of the 2d, and the flames rapidly spread throughout the entire building, eight stories high. About two hundred workmen were in the building at the time of the fire, several of whom perished in the flames. The fire communicated to adjoining buildings, and, owing to a scarcity of water, the firemen were unable to check its progress until about eight buildings, including several small dwellings, were destroyed. Two men were killed by jumping from an upper story of the factory, and several others were seriously hurt. The number perishing in the building was variously estimated, on the morning of the 4th, at from ten to forty. One woman died from fright. The property loss was estimated at about $500,000.

A HEAVY snow-storm occurred at Washington, N. H., on the 3d. At the base of the mountains the thermometer registered 31 degrees above zero.

PROF. WATSON, of the Michigan University at Ann Arbor, made an announcement, on the 3d, of the discovery of another planet of the eleventh stellar magnitude.

PERSONAL.

E. L. STANTON, son of the late Secretary Stanton, died in Washington, on the 29th, after a brief illness.

BURHAM YOUNG died at Salt Lake City, on the afternoon of the 29th, after a six days' illness, of cholera morbus. He was seventy-six years of age, and had been President of the Mormon Church since 1844. The Church will be managed by a quorum of the Twelve Apostles until a conference is held and a successor chosen.

THE Triennial Conclave of Knights Templar in session at Cleveland, on the 29th, elected Dr. Vincent L. Hurlburt, of Chicago, Most Eminent Grand Commander of the Knights Templar of the United States, and selected Chicago as the place for holding the next Triennial Conclave.

Not returning, her parents became alarmed, and a search was instituted. The City Council, some days later, offered a reward of $100 for the return of the child, and one or two spasmodic efforts were made to find her, but nothing resulted. From the hearsay left by the market to the present time, not the slightest trace of the little girl, or a clue to her probable fate, has been obtained. In the bond light of day, speaking both English and German, and thoroughly acquainted with the vicinity, she having been frequently sent upon similar errands in safety of 13,000 inhabitants, a little girl suddenly disappears, and after the lapse of six months the mystery surrounding her fate is as deep as ever. Brigham Young.

Brigham Young is dead. This news has been flashed all over this land and Europe. No other American is better known than was this remarkable man. His mail reached Egbert at four o'clock on the afternoon of Aug. 29, after an illness of six days. He died at his home, if a man of his surroundings could be said to have a home.

It would be carrying charity for the dead too far, and be too gross a disregard for truth, to pretend that his death was a loss, for that the world will deplore his departure from it. On the contrary, Brigham Young has long been looked upon as the pillar whereon polygamy rested, the prop without which it could not withstand the pressure of modern civilization. Consequently, his death brings hope that the "peculiar institution" which is now disgracing the continent and demoralizing, retarding and blighting in every way an otherwise thrifty Territory will disappear. Therein consists the significance of his death. This hope may be disappointed. Things change and go as unexpectedly in this strange world that perhaps Brigham, in this regard, may live more potent dead than alive. But this is it: many, the expectation is certainly reasonable. Very few men have the force of will and vast capacity for management which the deceased President of the Mormon Church possessed. He seems even unwieldy in comparison, and so are all the Twelve Apostles, as the dignitaries of the Mormon Church are called. The system of polygamy is utterly abhorrent to modern ideas. It belongs to antiquity and barbarism. Our ancestors, even as we, when we made laws to cause us to practice it, but the people from whom our religion came used it as a matter of course. It is probable that a great many of the Mormons are sincere. Perhaps the President of the Church was. His career in the early days of Mormonism would indicate it.

Brigham Young was a Yankee of the most pronounced type. Born in a little out of the way town of Vermont, June 1, 1801, he possessed the strongness and tenacity characteristic of the sons of the Puritans. His education was very meager. He joined the Mormon Church as early as 1832, in Ohio. It was then in its infancy. It had not developed into a polygamic monstrosity. It was a pious and prolific parent of fanaticism—a perversion of the lawlily second coming of Christ. During the period of his youth the strongness of soul stood heroically by his predecessor in the Presidency, Joe Smith. When he led the people, as there records say, into the wilderness of the plains to Utah, a generation ago, he did a grand thing. That burial of a handful of Christians on the banks of that dead sea of America, Salt Lake, was one of the bravest and most admirable enterprises of history. One cannot but be lost in admiration in the contemplation of such indomitable determination to meet destiny single-handed. With all its Dantic infamies, the Mormon settlement proved a great blessing to the country, furnishing a most convenient and necessary half-way house between the Pacific Slope and the East. The Pacific Railroad project owes more to Brigham Young, in a way, than any other. He has had no philanthropic or patriotic purpose. He was as destitute of patriotism as of philanthropy. But in a nature like the march of events used him for some good purpose, and we may hope that his life will prove to have been a public benefit.

Brigham Young leaves behind him a vast estate, to be divided among his numerous wives and children. He kept the matter a profound mystery in regard to the greater part of them, and appropriated to himself the wealth they produced. His property was in strict limits, to be concealed and distributed among the people whom he deprived of it by playing on their credulity. Not minding of the kind will be done. His heirs will keep what the lawyers do not get. But it is morally certain that the Mormon grasp, once freed from his personal despotism, will begin to lay by for their own families the surplus profits of their tillage. On the whole, then, the public has no cause to drop a single tear upon the bier of the dead Mormon. As he takes his place among the spent forces of humanity, he leaves a vacancy through which the sun of better days may throw its beams upon the people he has so long ruled with a rod of iron.—Chicago Journal.

THERE are two counties in the State of Pennsylvania which have not a rod of railroad within their limits—Forest and Greene.

THE SENTINEL.

WILLARD A. SMITH, Editor and Proprietor.

CHARLEVOIX, - - MICHIGAN.

A WOMAN'S LETTER.

My letter's late by one day,
But truth is, Jenny dear,
Neil Gregson came on Sunday—
It seems he's always here.
He, our young Fred W Kemble.
They said there she sat hours,
And she was in a dreadful pet
He brought some lovely flowers.

I meant to tell you, Jenny,
The use and everything,
But I find how he's mad
In the next week. Need a bit sing
With the Mozart Club at Irving;
I'll manage, dear to go.
The Pike and weather serving—
I don't want me to know!

Jem, lovers are a nuisance!
Vernie brought the ring last night—
A scrill the, like bonnet;
It gave us a fine fright.
Now, Jenny, I'm not fooling,
The girls could live to board in
Their interest to one!

Poor George, the foolish fellow,
Began to storm and drag,
And turned quite red and yellow—
I hate him out of things.
How Nature has always ordered;
I think his cool, gray eye,
Would still be bright.
Or make a regiment fly.

But what's so very funny
About him, you want to know—
He is not a any money;
I hope Fred's fortune screen
Just how he's situated—
Keep he looks like Work & Ware.
Ah, well, those things are fated!
George owns a million, square.

Yes, dear, Pike trims the corners,
Rough-hew them as we may!
We can't go, but leave worries,
Or wear the livelong day.
But, oh, don't breathe it, Jenny!
I'd marry Ned, you see.
When I marry single penny,
If only he loved me!

Ah, well—well—well—that's tolly,
Just nonsense, Jen, I'm thought,
He, too, seemed melancholy,
Quite glances that I've caught.
Looked full of speechless sadness—
There goes a coffin bell!
To bind the page, what madness!
Good-bye, pet, George is here.

We dine at Rita Johnson's,
P. S.—I must decide.
He won't accept with much nonsense.
The crepe comes full yard wide.
Don't get the half I have on,
Have theirs and split up sacque,
For organdies are meager.
My heart aches. Love to Jack.

FAMOUS AUTOMATA.

Though the ancients were deficient in mechanical skill, some of the accounts handed down to us seem to show that automata existed even in the remotest ages. Homer says that the tripods made by Vulcan for the banqueting hall of the gods were self-moving, advancing of their own accord to the table, and then returning to their stations. Aristotle mentions automatic tripods, and Archimedes, of Tyana, is said to have made a flying dove. Archytas, of Tarentum (B. C 400) is said by Aulus Gellius, on the authority of Favorinus, to have constructed a wooden pigeon which was capable of flying. After alighting it could not resume its flight.

A curious water-clock, presented to the Emperor Charlemagne by the Caliph Haroun al-Raschid, deserves mention, as one of the earliest—if not the earliest—pieces of modern mechanism. There were twelve doors, which in the dial-plate, to correspond with the division of the day into hours. The hours were struck by the successive opening of the doors, and at the falling therefrom of small balls upon a brazen bell. At twelve o'clock twelve little figures emerged in order, and came out at the same instant, and after parading around the dial, shut all the doors, and returned to their places.

John Muller, or Regiomontanus, is credited with having constructed an automatic eagle, which, on the arrival of the Emperor Maximilian to Nuremberg in 1470, flew out to meet His Majesty, and, after having done so at some distance from the city, returned and perched upon the gate. When the Emperor approached, the eagle received on its head a wreath of laurel, which it bore in triumph to the interior of the city. Regiomontanus is also said to have made an automaton man who saluted the Emperor at every point (Brewer).

Mallardet constructed a number of automata of the most perfect kind. One of these was a steel spider, which established all the movements of that animal. It ran on a table, always toward the center, to prevent it from running off the table, and went hasted for three minutes. He also constructed a caterpillar, a lizard, a mouse and a serpent, which put into the mouth, finished and darted out its tongue. The singing bird of the same kind was still more delicate. Under a oval box, about three inches long, was set upon the table, and in an instant the bird flew up, and, perching on the edge of the box, about three inches from the bottom, began to warble. It opened its bill and moved the pipe from the figure's hand, and wound up the machinery. The automaton was then ready for play, which began as soon as an opponent was found in the audience. The automaton took the first move in all cases. "At every move made by the automaton the wheels of the machine are heard in action; the figure moves its head, and seems to look over every part of the chess-board. When it gives check to its opponent it shakes its head twice, and only twice when it checks the queen. It likewise shakes its head when a false move is made, replaces its adversary's piece on the square from which it was taken, and takes the next move itself. In general, though not always, the automaton wins the game. During the progress of the game the exhibitor stands near the machine, and when it is time for it to move, he looks in vain for chess-men in either hand, ready to throw them upon the President. Being in some doubt how to proceed in the automaton's play, he takes up the proper person or whom to bestow their honors, they very naturally took the best-looking man in the party for the President, and bestowed their favors accordingly. In consequence, Gov. Van Zandt was almost smothered with roses, and had to beg Mrs. Hayes to set the matter right. She did not care, however, to interfere, and so the fun went on.

—Mr. Bonner says he can't read the "Fatin Diamond." It is said that one of her brothers would not become a Good Templar on any consideration, because he found a rare big stone. Miss Schreiner finding all ordinary means of converting him failed to Temperance principles in vain, at last prayed that he might find a large diamond. Soon after the monster gem was unearthed, and the brother, who was a partner in the claim property, was so good as his word. He became, and is still, a consistent Good Templar. Local merchants have offered $100,000 for the stone. The lady is an enthusiastic temperance advocate, and preaches with wonderful ability.

Ridicule and Reform in Spelling.

Ridicule is a powerful weapon, and this as often used it a bad cause as a good recovers. Indeed, the temptation to use it to further the ends of injustice is supreme, for derision will often serve to discredit an experiment or an opinion where logic would find no room to stand. Thus we see it summoned to promote fraud, bankcrism and retrogression. The Cincinnati Commercial turns it against the commendable movement to reform the barbarous spelling of the English language. Here the weapon is very effective, and is so simple that a child can fire it off. What can be thought of a mode of spelling," says the Facetious Commercial, "in which 'cone' appears as 'kum,' and 'knowledge' takes the form of 'nolej'?" And the question seems by the querist to be settled, and the people of the nation thrown back upon the old system. The Commercial reproduces some specimens of the proposed alphabet, spelled on a phonograph, in order to ridicule their grotesqueness, and this is aggravated by numerous typographical errors, averaging about one for each three words. The effect thus becomes very ludicrous indeed.

We are slaves of the eye. Mr. Robert Bonner recently said, with the sagacity which has given him success, "People cannot begin to change their habits suddenly. For one issue of a paper to look differently from the preceding issue offends in the interest of the late Emperor is indulgently looked on by the Imperial Government. In Turkey, where Bazaine's master was the best friend of the Sultan, Bazaine would be received with open arms by those of his friends, who knew his value in any capacity as a trained soldier. That he should have concealed his identity with the utmost care is equally natural, and had not the war come it is possible he might have concealed it till his death, but war with Russia, by an agonist of twenty years ago, could not fail to bring Osman Pasha in contact with the people who know Gen. Bazaine as Governor of Sabastopol. Whether the secret leaked out through some Russian officer prisoner in his hands, or some English or French attache who had served in the Crimea and recognized Osman Pasha, is uncertain, but the character of his fighting at Plevna, a stubborn, defensive battle, is curiously like the first day at Gravelotte, though the difference of force on the enemy's side led him to a happier issue.—Army and Navy Journal.

PERSONAL AND LITERARY.

—William Lloyd Garrison is remarkable for his youthful appearance in his old age. A writer in a Liverpool paper says: "No one would take him to be in his seventy-third year. He is one of the youngest septuagenarians I ever saw."

—"Long" Bluthell, "the strong man of the world," once well known in the circus arena, is in the Poor House of Putnam County. In his time he could hold back two yoke of oxen, and support a weight of 1,800 pounds resting on his chest and hands and feet, with his stomach upward.—N. Y. World.

And Mseer Highee put his hat gently over his face and said, in a faltering voice, And even that is not my best, Yer Majesty!"

—The story that Moulton is financially embarrassed, and that Tilton offered to loan him several thousands of dollars, is going to rounds in spite of the contradiction it got in the Brooklyn Eagle, where it first appeared. The fact is that Mr. Tilton has not offered to loan Moulton thousands of dollars, for two excellent reasons: First, he had not the money to loan; and second, Moulton is not financially embarrassed, and does not need to borrow money. The tale was manufactured out of an old experiment which Tilton once made on the queen. It likewise shakes its head when a false move is made, replaces its adversary's piece on the square from which it was taken, and takes the next move itself. In general, though not always, the automaton wins the game. During the progress of the game the exhibitor stands near the machine, and when it is time for it to move, he looks in vain for chess-men in either hand, ready to throw them upon the President. Ridicule and Reform in Spelling.

Ridicule is a powerful weapon, and this as often used it a bad cause as a good recovers. Indeed, the temptation to use it to further the ends of injustice is supreme, for derision will often serve to discredit an experiment or an opinion where logic would find no room to stand. Thus we see it summoned to promote fraud, bankcrism and retrogression. The Cincinnati Commercial turns it against the commendable movement to reform the barbarous spelling of the English language. Here the weapon is very effective, and is so simple that a child can fire it off. What can be thought of a mode of spelling," says the Facetious Commercial, "in which 'cone' appears as 'kum,' and 'knowledge' takes the form of 'nolej'?" And the question seems by the querist to be settled, and the people of the nation thrown back upon the old system. The Commercial reproduces some specimens of the proposed alphabet, spelled on a phonograph, in order to ridicule their grotesqueness, and this is aggravated by numerous typographical errors, averaging about one for each three words. The effect thus becomes very ludicrous indeed.

We are slaves of the eye. Mr. Robert Bonner recently said, with the sagacity which has given him success, "People cannot begin to change their habits suddenly. For one issue of a paper to look differently from the preceding issue offends in the interest of the late Emperor is indulgently looked on by the Imperial Government. In Turkey, where Bazaine's master was the best friend of the Sultan, Bazaine would be received with open arms by those of his friends, who knew his value in any capacity as a trained soldier. That he should have concealed his identity with the utmost care is equally natural, and had not the war come it is possible he might have concealed it till his death, but war with Russia, by an agonist of twenty years ago, could not fail to bring Osman Pasha in contact with the people who know Gen. Bazaine as Governor of Sabastopol. Whether the secret leaked out through some Russian officer prisoner in his hands, or some English or French attache who had served in the Crimea and recognized Osman Pasha, is uncertain, but the character of his fighting at Plevna, a stubborn, defensive battle, is curiously like the first day at Gravelotte, though the difference of force on the enemy's side led him to a happier issue.—Army and Navy Journal.

OUR RADIX LETTER.

New York, Sept 14, 1877.

The destroying angel has been busy with the leaders of well-know names of late It is an unaccountable fact, but none the less true, that Death, who "views a shining mark" loves to wait till he can get several such targets in long and then "cuts loose" on them all at once. It does not often happen however that he gets so successful an array as the yellow fever just winged its way half the known space of the globe, striking in quick succession six men who have for years moved before the public eye. Three, Brigham Young, Raphael Semmes, H. L. Davenport, Ben De Bar Alvin Adams and "Crazy Horse." What a strangely assorted company to cross the River together!

Apropos of Brigham Young I must confess to having made a mistake, as a result of his death. I had always supposed that, with exception of perhaps a few scattered members, the Mormon Church was concentrated in Utah; but the attention turned to the subject by the loss of the prophet developes the fact that there is and has been for over thirty years a rival Mormon organization of "Saints" of most remarkable power, having their headquarters in Brooklyn. This organization numbered four hundred members, including men of wealth and influence. Probably the air of Brooklyn is not pure for them. Further down I may inform there is one other small sect which is the only other in the city. As the rites and observances of the Mormon religion are kept up by these Eastern societies, which have each having memorial services and a season of lamentation over the loss of their crafty and powerful leader. Polygamy alone, which by the way, formed no part of the original "revelation," has to be omitted from their programme. The laws of New York allow every man to believe what he pleases but don't countenance his carrying all his beliefs into effect, and even young ex-Young as their section to intimidate the government, the poor oppressed "Saints" of Long Island have to get along with one wife or else "go west."

The fire fiend allowed New York to get through the month of August with a fire loss of only $17,000, the smallest loss for any month on record. But in order to make up the average he commenced bright and early this month, with a half million blaze which laid waste over a block in the northern part of town. This fire though no larger than many another, is worth some mention on account of the general row it has caused. The block building burned, and the one in which the fire started, was the piano factory of one Hale, whose care must linger if he has read the papers since the event. His factory was a mere fire trap, entirely without protection against fire and so shoddily put up that on the occasion of its creation, a few years ago, it fell down when almost completed, burying several persons in its ruins. It was run right up again, however in the same slovenly way and has now brought about this catastrophe, involving greater loss of life than before. The only redeeming trait felt against Hale has prompted some investigation of his business, in the course of which it turns out that he is the manufacturer of most of the bogus pianos which have flooded the country for many years. His plan is to throw together the cheapest kind of work, and then stencil on the name-board a name approximating as closely as possible that of one of the standard makes. He has thus imitated the brands of all the prominent manufacturers, but has naturally expended most of his efforts in trying to pirate the reputation of Steinway & Sons, who are the most prominent of all. To this end he has used no less than six different imitations of their name, to wit: "Steinway & Sons" "Steinway & Sons" "Steinway & Son" "Steinmetz & Sons," "Steinway Piano" "Steinway & Co." By means of this fraud he has sold hundreds of worthless pianos before suspicion was aroused. Now they seem having genuine Steinway power. The lesson we learn is that it seems impossible to stop these disreputable operations, and the only protection is to buy of a house that has made "Steinway & Sons" famous as the iron protected trade mark of every instrument offered purporting to come from that celebrated house.

At this writing no one knows how many perished in the disaster. As soon as the ruins are sufficiently cool, however excavations will be made and the worst will be known.

Rifle shooting has again loomed up as an object of interest. The national teams of England and America are putting the last and most careful touches to their practice at the Creedmoor range, preparatory to the grand match on the 13th and 14th inst. when it will be seen whether American skill has deteriorated since a year ago when our marksmen bore off the trophy in competition with the world. Some of the best scores on record have been made on both sides during this recent practice, showing that the British marksmen are going to make an desperate an effort to "clear" Victory from its perch on the American Banner as our own boys will to induce Victory to stay where she is. Teams from New Orleans and San Francisco are also on the ground and doing fine work.

The Recent Terrible Accident on the Chicago, Rock Island & Pacific Railroad.

DES MOINES, Iowa, Aug 29.

The bridge on the Rock Island Road where the disaster occurred was over what is known as Little Four Mile Creek nine miles east of DesMoines. It is a little stream, generally quiet, and never before known to be so high as it was made by the unprecedented rainfall of yesterday morning and the night before. The bridge rested on 4 stone arch twelve feet in the clear, by walls five feet thick. The bridge is approached from the east on a curve, and from a grade. It is thought the rails were left standing along as the train approached, and the engineer who had slackened his speed till he came in sight of the bridge, supposing all was right, dashed upon it. The chasm at that season was forty or fifty feet wide, and the banks about twenty feet high. The locomotive, in its wild dash, leaped with the force of the whole side and half buried itself in the earth. Barnum's car was next the engine. It dropped into the channel. The baggage and mail car followed, passed directly over it, smashing it to pieces, but going to the bottom, a hard river running right through it. The men in that car escaped alive. Even the lamps were not put out.

The first passenger car pitched headdown into the channel, where the water was at least fifteen feet deep. The next car was piled under this, telescoping with it, and the next telescoped half through the two preceding it. The sleeping car did not go into the wreck, simply because there was not room for it. Its occupants were jarred, but none of them seriously hurt. The list of the killed were in the car in front of the sleeper.

The scene at the time of the accident is described as having been terrific. Rain was falling in torrents, accompanied by wind, lightning and violent thunder. The crash put out the lights, and the scene of terror ensuing may well be imagined. The men who were not injured and could get out, went to work at once to rescue the living and the wounded. They had to go a mile to a farmhouse to get axes to cut away the logs of the wrecked bridge, and by daylight had the most of the wounded rescued.

There were many painful scenes and fatal incidents. One mother was killed sitting between two children who escaped unhurt. One little girl with her dead father in the water for four hours with a heavy man lying dead beneath her body, was discovered to be breathing, and was rescued and restored, and now shows no sign of injury.

The dead were brought here on a train, reaching here at eleven o'clock. Some twenty-five of the wounded came with them. The officers of the road were at the wreck all day, caring for the dead and wounded, and have been and are doing all that can possibly be done for them.

The number of killed is estimated all the way from ten to fifty. All the train but a sleeping car went down into the stream. The engine is completely out of sight. A special to the State Register from there says there were sixteen killed so far as known. Twelve bodies are out on the banks, and four bodies are still down in the wreck, but cannot be got out at present.

OMAHA, Neb., Aug. 30

R. M. Cherrie, of the firm of A. B. Meeker & Co., Chicago, arrived here to-day from the scene of the disaster on the Chicago & Rock Island Railroad, east of DesMoines. Mr. Cherrie says:

"The accident occurred about half-past two o'clock in the morning. It was raining fearfully at the time—pouring down. I was in the sleeper, partially awake, and felt two or three slight jars. I raised the window and looked out, and heard the rush of waters below. I knew something had happened, though I could see nothing. It was very dark. I got up and put on my pants, and the first thing I saw was people rushing out of the rear end of the car next to us, and it was not long before I knew the character of the terrible accident. Of course, everything was confusion, and it was some little time before those who were unhurt could get to work and relieve the others. It seems a stone culvert had recently been built, and on each side of it was trestle-work that was being filled up with earth. The fireman, who escaped, says everything ran right when they ran on the bridge, but the next thing he knew was that he was lying alongside the engine in the sand below. Engineer Bales can ascribe to him, but that was the last the fireman heard of him, and he probably died almost instantly afterward. There were fifteen persons in Barnum's advertising car. The car was completely annihilated. Seven of the occupants were killed, three badly wounded, and they will probably die, and three were slightly wounded. It was a miracle that anybody at all got out of that car. One of the wounded men was carried down stream and landed on a small island, from which he was afterward taken off. The baggage car shot across and over the engine, and landed on the bank beyond, with a rail through it lengthwise, and one through it sideways. It sits flat on the track, right side up, but without its trucks, which disappeared in this wonderful leap. The employes in this car were not hurt, strange to say, and even some hooded pigs that were being shipped by express were unharmed. The baggage was not damaged at all. The smoking car came along, plunging downward, the rear end raising up and allowing the next passenger coach to go under it, and then the next car went under this last coach, and the rear ends of the two last coaches resting on the bank. There was a time-card was wedged in, one on top of the other. A lady crawled up through a hole and got on top of the smoking car, with a child in her arms, and got down on the roof of the next car, when, she left the child. She then returned down into the smoking car and brought up another child in the same way, and next helped out an old lady from the same place. I helped her down from the car myself. Out of that hole which she had left, we took five or six others, among whom was the conductor, who was badly wounded, while several persons got out themselves without aid. All that we helped out were severely wounded. We then went into the car and made a thorough examination, but found nobody but dead persons, of whom there were four or five. By this time it began to grow a little light, so we could see better to work. Up to this time we had feared that the cars were going to tip over, but we now saw that they would remain upright. We got under the rear of the top car, as well as under the other two cars, and released four men that were fastened in. We used rope to pull them out. A corps of physicians and train workers now arrived from DesMoines, and they all went to work with a will. The physicians especially deserve the greatest credit for their untiring efforts to relieve suffering. They did noble work. The ladies in the sleeper also rendered efficient services in assisting the wounded. A girl who was found last in the wreck was finally released from her dreadful situation. About eight o'clock we counted ten persons in that pit. We had to cut out the side of the middle car in order to rescue several persons. There was more loss of life in this car than in any of the others, except Barnum's. Eighteen dead bodies were taken out last night when we left. There were thirty wounded, four of her whom will die. I cannot describe the terrible scene and do it justice in any respect. No one can realize such a situation unless he be there to witness it, and even then he cannot picture it to others in the vividness of detail as he himself viewed it."

The Savings Bank Failure in Chicago.

The worst news the Times has been called upon to communicate to its readers since the panic of four years ago, is the fact that the State Savings Institution has failed. This calamity has been expected for some weeks, but it will be none the less disastrous to the thousands whose fortunes are thus swept away, for, while waiting for the apparently inevitable crash, they have been powerless to help themselves in any degree from its consequences. The "sixty days rule" tied the hands of depositors and left them completely at the mercy of the managers. The institution, whose career is now closed, was organized twenty years ago, and for the greater part of the intervening period its management commanded the full confidence of the community. In 1872 Mr. D. D. Spencer obtained a large interest in the concern, and very soon afterward the gentlemen who had till then controlled it found means of disposing of their interests. Spencer secured $270,000 worth of the stock, while the bank itself owned $200,000, and only a paltry $30,000 remained for the persons who nominally filled the directory and the executive offices. The exact extent of the legal responsibility of these persons for the acts of criminal mismanagement upon which the bank then entered, and which has led to the present catastrophe, remains to be ascertained. About their moral responsibility there is apparently no room for question. It was their business to know, if they did not, what their President was doing with the funds which the public entrusted to their keeping. Those funds were in almost every instance the hard-earned savings of the poor; the provision made through continual self-denial for the inevitable "rainy day." They represented the bread of the widow, the fatherless, the aged and infirm. The hopes of tens of thousands were bound up in the little sums which, accumulated dollar by dollar, and poured into the treasury of this bank, swelled the grand total of its deposits, as shown by a hasty glance over the books yesterday, to $2,681,756. The owners of this sum number, perhaps, twelve thousand. Probably there are not a hundred of them who will not suffer serious inconvenience from the failure of the bank. Doubtless there are thousands of them who will suffer inexpressible hardship from it. Their money has been squandered in wild speculations; sunk beyond recovery in reckless ventures. Buried in real estate for which there is no market, and from which there is no hope of realizing more than a fraction of the investment.

The bank made an assignment, yesterday, to Mr. Abner Taylor, who will proceed to ascertain and realize the value of the assets as soon as practicable. There are no means at present of making an estimate as to the percentage of the dividends which may be ultimately made.—Chicago Times, Aug. 30.

A Lively Adventure with a Bear.

On Thursday last a young man named McDonald, belonging to Gay's River, had a narrow escape from being devoured by a bear in the woods near his home. He was making towards the woods when he heard a rustling sound behind him. Turning around he saw a large-sized she bear coming towards him. He had just time to spring for the nearest tree and climb up it. The bear sprang at him, and catching one of his feet with her paw tore off the shoe and stocking and badly lacerated the flesh. McDonald managed to crawl out on a limb, whither the bear attempted to follow, but the limb was too narrow. Failed in this she began to tear savagely at the limb on which Mr. McDonald, holding on by his hands, screamed mainly for help. A man near by, hearing his cries, approached just as the bear dropped from the tree. McDonald called out to the newcomer to look out for the bear, and at that moment the savage animal rushed at the man, who nimbly climbed into the same tree, followed by the bear. The newcomer's only safety was to get out on the same limb as McDonald, and the bear, too, crawled out. Under the weight the limb broke, and bear and men fell a distance of some twenty feet. Fortunately the bear was stunned by the fall, and the bear, though badly shaken, were able to get away. Obtaining arms, which they were entirely without, they returned to the spot, but the bear could not be found.—Charlottetown (Va.) Herald.

A CORRESPONDENT of the Troy Times says that the Hoosac Tunnel's freight and passenger business has increased 150 per cent. during the present fiscal year.

INCIDENTS AND ACCIDENTS.

—In the year 1845 the late James Bidwell, then postmaster from Hickletown to Saybrook, did errands for the people living on his post route, deposited their money, collected their bills, etc. He dispositeu that year, for a gentleman living in a town down the river, in the Middletown Savings Bank, the sum of $150. The gentleman visited the bank for the first time last Tuesday, bringing his bank book with the original deposit to have the interest added to it. Great was his surprise to find that in thirty-two years it had accumulated $873 18 interest, making in all due on his book to May 1, $1,023 18.

—New Haven (Conn.) Palladium.

—At Highmarket, Lewis County, the six year-old daughter of Mrs. Theodore Mark ham was left alone in charge of a baby, in trying to light a lamp to heat milk for the baby, the child set her own clothes on fire. She started to run out doors, fearing the house was going to be burned, and noticing that pieces of her burning clothes had dropped on the floor, she carefully extinguished them. She finally got out doors and threw herself into a horse-trough, putting out the fire. She then returned to the house, and waited patiently for her agony would permit, waited for her mother. When Mrs. Markham returned, the little one said: "Mamma, I takes into the house, but I shall die." She lived one hour and a half after the accident.—Rochester (N. Y.) Express.

—A few weeks ago a boy in Lancaster, Pa., fell between the bumpers of a moving train, but his pantaloons catching on some projection of the car, he was suspended over the rail without injury until the train stopped, when he was released. Had the cloth been of poorer quality, or had the lad would have been killed. This incident shows the advantage of wearing strong clothing. In Lancaster County, a few days ago, a man who was driving a threshing machine had one of the legs of his pantaloons caught in the couplings and torn completely off. Had the cloth been of slimmer stuff the man probably would have been killed. The moral of this incident is—well, it is so plainly and distinctly opposed to the fact that it is hardly worth while indicating.—Norristown (Pa.) Herald.

—On Saturday morning a strange accident happened to a young man employed at the foot of Union street. A little boy, a year and a half old, named Jhamie Hassell, walked out of the back door of his house, and went in between two buildings, which are only about nine inches apart at each end. The boy could pass in at the other, until he wedged himself in so that he could not move either way. His mother discovered where he was, but could not get to him. His sister about twelve years old, went up-stairs and attempted to go down the same passage-way, but got down so she could reach him, but at this point she stipped, and was so fastened that it was impossible for her to move. A large crowd congregated, but it was a long time before they could get to the child between the buildings, and the children were obliged to remain in their unpleasant position for the space of an hour. Their fond parents had been assured out of the side of the house, when they were released.—Bangor (Me.) Whig

Catching the Train.

A young man, thirty years of age, was a little late, and had to run to get on the train. But he was scarcely set up firmly on the platform when he threw up his hand, and would have fallen had he not been caught. During the train arrived at the next station he was dead. The Coroner's jury brought in a verdict to the effect that death was from syncope of the heart, brought on by running, after a hearty meal. There is in this simple narrative, taken from an English sanitary periodical, a lesson which many may profitably learn and remember. How many business men of the large cities, whose residences are much of the year in the country, have a run every morning to catch the train. That run is followed by a gulp; clothes are donned with a spasmodic effort, the distance is walked or run over with breathless anxiety and haste; the train is at the depot on time, and its platform is gained as it is moving away. The heated passenger takes his seat, out of breath, feels that his heart is beating with great violence, his head seems compressed. But after a few minutes of rest his heart regains its normal stroke, his breathing becomes natural, and he resumes his wonted composure. His his system received no damage by his disturbance of the vital organs? Apparently it has not. He did not fall by the faint, if it is true; he did not drop dead. Still, was his heart as sound as before the exertion? We think not. It had suffered a rupture of the heart valves. It may perform its function for many years, if not further severely taxed; but the foundation is laid for future trouble.

It is well stated, in the commentary upon the accident in the article referred to, that the number of persons who systematically delay to the last moment and run desperately for the train is by no means counted by hundreds on each of the great lines. A large majority of these persons are not trained or otherwise prepared for such efforts. Their pursuits are sedentary; there is no preparation on the part of the internal organs to undergo sudden strain, as in the case of laborers. The heavy meal distends the space in which the heart beats; and that organ, taxed by sudden effort at the same time, stopped, and its pantomime died. He was a young man and apparently in perfect health. He had run in the same way many times before, without harm. Why should he not repeat the experiment every morning? Evidently he repeated it one too many times. Every repetition made him more and more liable to the accident. The heart was becoming enfeebled by the overstrain. It only required that this organ should be compressed by a distended stomach, and then put on the pressure to paralyze it. This accident, though rare, is one to which any of those persons who habitually tax by to the last minute and then have to make a sudden effort is liable.

The following suggestions from the same source are eminently judicious: The dangers of such sudden strain are not confined to failure of the heart upon the spot. Very commonly in those cases where apparently healthy old people are found dead in bed there may be traced on a history of sudden effort made during the preceding day. The overstrain so put upon the heart does not manifest itself fully at the time; but during the sleep of the ensuing night. With elderly people sudden exertion during the day is undoubtedly one cause of failure of the heart's action during the night. Nor are these fatal results the only untoward consequences of sudden demand upon the powers. Much more commonly the effort is followed by shortness of breath on exertion, by palpitation greatly reduced, by incapacity to undergo any violent effort, and even by enfeeblement of the powers for some considerable time after the effort which produced these consequences has been made. A chronic condition of impaired vitality is thus brought about by undue effort, even in the young and comparatively robust who are accustomed to exertion; by persons in the prime of vigorous, perhaps, to impress upon business men the risks that they run from their habit of delay until it becomes necessary to make a severe effort to catch the train. Doubtless, it is done by a multitude of persons with breathless anxiety and haste; the train is at the depot on time, and its platform is gained as it is moving away. The heated passenger takes his seat, out of breath, feels that his heart is beating with great violence, his head seems compressed. But after a few minutes of rest his heart regains its normal stroke, his breathing becomes natural, and he resumes his wonted composure. BURNED TO DEATH.

Destructive Fire in New York City—A Large Flour Factory and a Number of Other Buildings Consumed —Several Persons Perish in the Flames.

NEW YORK, Sept. 3.

Shortly after nine o'clock this morning one of the most disastrous fires that has occurred in this city broke out in Dale's plane factory, situated about the center of the block bounded by Thirty-fifth and Thirty-sixth streets and Tenth and Eleventh avenues. The buildings were of brick and of the flimsiest construction, being eight and nine stories in height. The newer of the two structures was built on the ruins of the factory blown down in 1871, at which time several persons were killed. In the old factory some 200 hands were employed. No one of those seemed to think of turning in an alarm, and, when the first engines arrived, the whole factory was wrapped in flame and smoke. The workmen on the fourth floor and below got out without trouble. The floors above were mostly filled with dense smoke, causing most of the occupants to run to the windows and roof. Two men, Greb, called Nat, and Albert Lee, aged fifty-two, were seen to fall backward from a window into the flames, and, undoubtedly, both perished, no trace of them having since been found. The flames, fanned by a brisk gale, spread rapidly, and in less than an hour the walls of the old factory fell, with a crash that was heard a mile. A moment later the new factory was a blaze of flame, and speedily five factories, twenty-two tenements, fifteen shanties and eighteen stables and sheds were consumed.

The people of the tenement houses and shanties saved scarcely any of their effects, being driven out by the intense heat. The sparks were carried in every direction, and were beaten down by citizens, among whom was Capt. Jourdan, of Graham's silk factory, on Thirty-fifth street, could not be saved. Robe's immense packing establishment was saved by a private hose conveyance.

The scene was grand. There was an area of fire extending over two blocks. The flames leaped Thirty-fifth street and swept nearly the entire block. They ran across Thirty-sixth street and destroyed five buildings. Nearly all the houses facing on Tenth avenue were licked up, and, while the fire was under control, leaving two or three tall chimneys and a few tottering walls with great heaps of steaming debris behind them, a glowing charcoal to mark the site of over sixty buildings.

From the first the rumors regarding the loss of life began to spread. From five men buried in the ruins, the number was run up to fifty or more. Eight persons sent to the hospitals brought thirteen ambulances to the scene—many more than were needed. It will always be hard to ascertain the actual loss of life. Two men were killed by jumping from a window, and others are missing. The fireman says there are not less than forty bodies in the ruins. The number of men on the upper floors at the time of the alarm is not known. Various persons living in the vicinity report seeing numbers of men carried down in the burning buildings, and all sorts of stories are afloat.

The losses on the property destroyed and damaged will not much exceed $500,000. In all, eighty buildings were either destroyed or damaged by the fire.

The fire began in the drying-room on the fourth floor of the old factory. In the new factory were piled lumber for planes were laid away until they became properly seasoned. The room was almost twelve feet high, and filled with lumber. The remainder of the fourth floor was occupied by the carvers, about forty in number. These men discovered the fire before nine o'clock. They thought of little account, and gave no alarm. Some of them busied themselves in removing lumber from the room, while the others threw upon the flames all the water they had on the floor. Not more than half a dozen pails full of water were thus expended. After thus combatting the flames for about ten minutes the carvers gave up the work, and, seeing the fire likely to spread into their shop, began assisting in packing up their tools and clothing for removal. None of them thought of giving an alarm to their fellow-workmen on the upper floors. The flames, meeting with no opposition, grew in strength. Very soon a rush caught and carried them beyond the door way and tearing of the door from its apartment of its casings. At once they took an end to one and from side to side of the room, driving the workmen out. It was then that the peril of the workers on the upper floors became apparent. They were given the alarm. All the carvers had already carried with them their tools, and the workmen employed on the three lower floors also got out in safety, but those on the two top floors lost their implements.

Carl Carlinski, of No. 154 Broome street, a varnisher, jumped out of the eighth-story window and was instantly killed. Otto Pisdorf, of 412 West Forty-eighth street, a varnisher, also jumped from a window on the eighth floor and was instantly killed. His body was picked up from the sidewalk, by the the police, and taken on a street-car to the Thirty-seventh Street Police Station. Paul Hess and Thomas Ludwig, varnishers, jumped from windows and were badly bruised and carried home by the Kern town Lumber Company, of 412 West Forty-ninth street, and Hugh Logan, of Graham's silk factory, on Thirty-fifth street, could not be saved. Robe's immense packing establishment was saved by a private hose conveyance.
